I. PROJECT SUMMARY

NAME OF SURVEY

Charleston County Historic Resources Survey Update.

BOUNDARIES OF SURVEY AREA

The survey area is the entire county, with a concentration on those resources that are in unincorporated Charleston County. Unincorporated areas of the islands of James, Johns, Wadmalaw, and Edisto were also included in the survey, while the portion of the county within the Francis Marion National Forest was excluded from the survey.

NUMBER OF PROPERTIES SURVEYED

There were 1,319 properties surveyed.

AREA SURVEYED

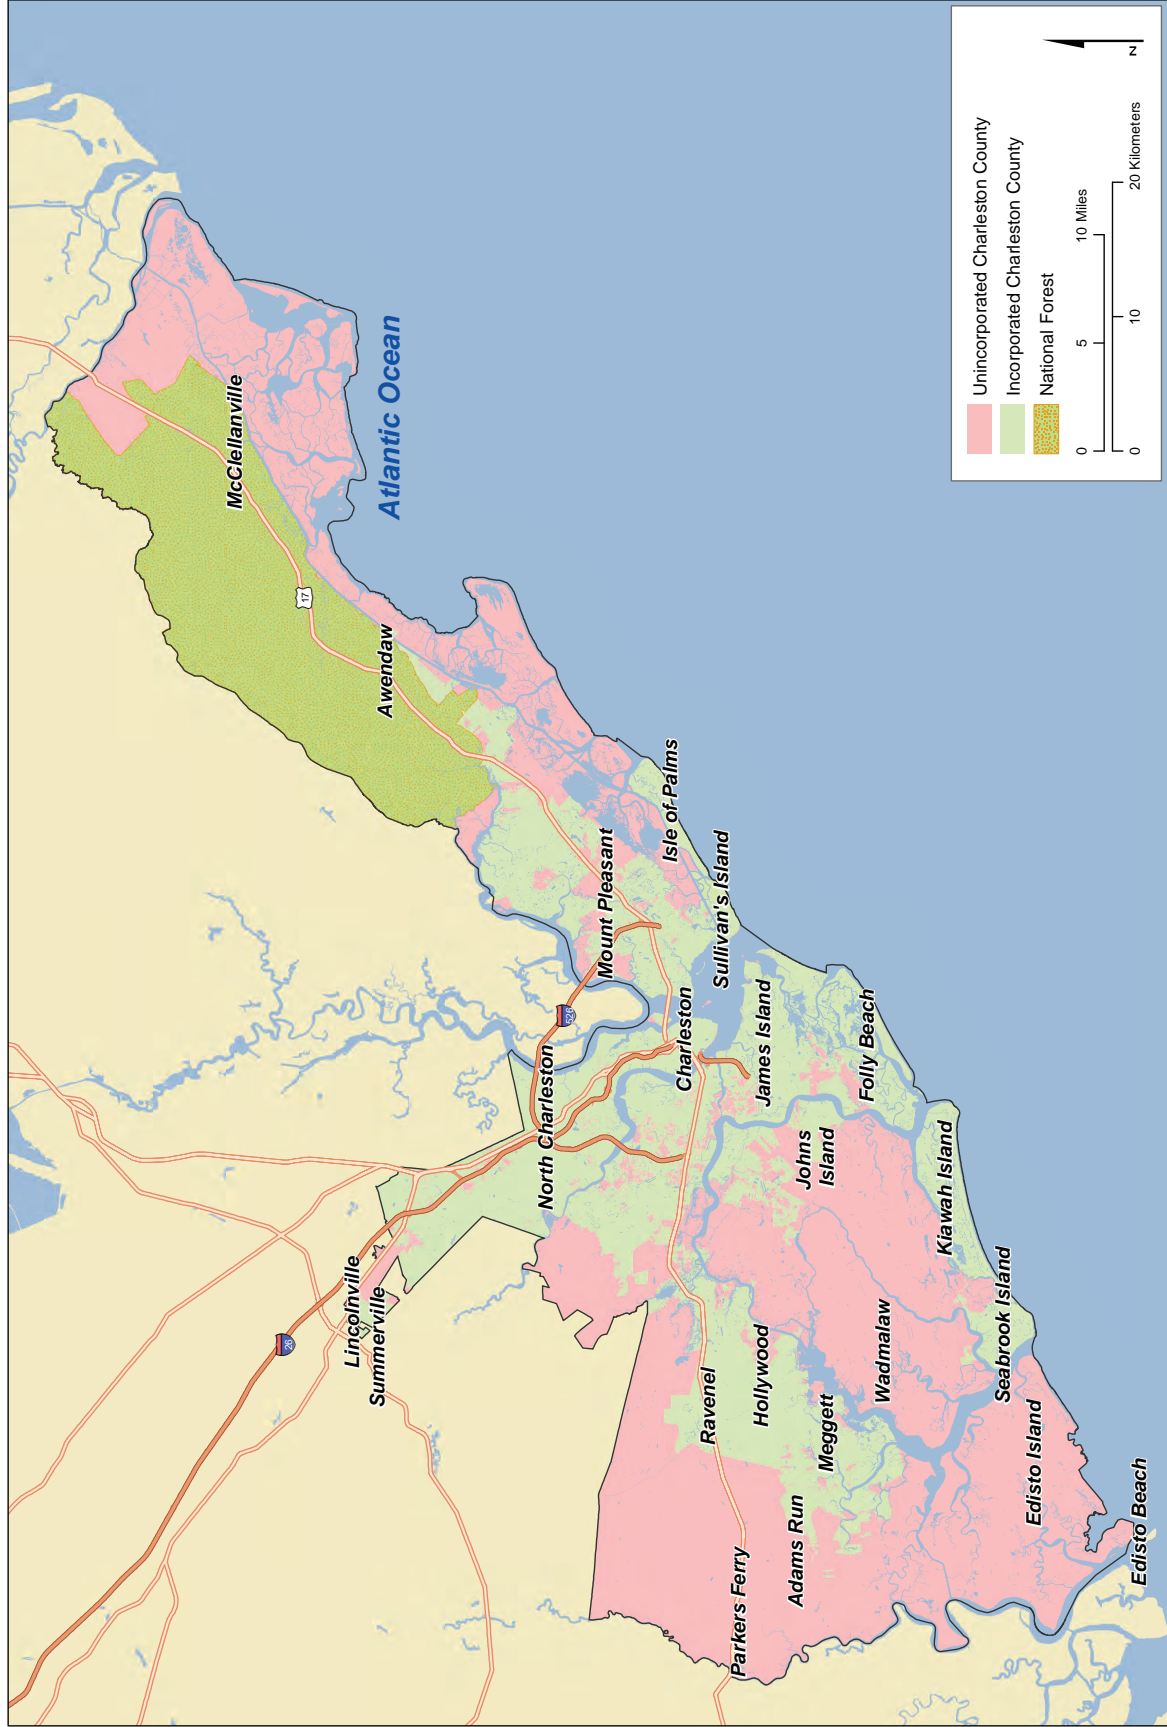

The total area of unincorporated Charleston County is 878 square miles (Figure 1). Of that, approximately 110 square miles was surveyed.

PROJECT HISTORY

The demolition of West Ashley's Limehouse Produce Shed in the fall of 2013 brought to light weaknesses in Charleston County's preservation ordinance, which only affords protection to properties listed on the National Register of Historic Places (NRHP). Constructed in 1939, the Limehouse Produce Shed was West Ashley's open-air produce market, providing local truck farmers a space to sell their crops and residents a gathering place, in addition to the fresh vegetables and fruits. Despite its importance to the community, the building was never nominated for the NRHP nor was it the subject of redevelopment during the seven years it sat vacant. The loss of the produce shed was the impetus for the Charleston County Planning Commission to begin reviewing the county's historic preservation ordinance and identifying necessary changes to ensure local history is not lost due to the county's continued and rapid development.

In early 2014, the Planning Commission formed the Historic Preservation Committee and set out to update the county's inventory of historic resources. The Historic Preservation Committee worked with the county planning staff to apply for a federal historic preservation grant to update the 1989 and 1992 Charleston County surveys. Understanding there were limited resources available for the project, the survey parameters were set to focus on buildings and structures located in unincorporated Charleston County that date to the mid-twentieth century. Completing an update to the county survey would be the first of many steps in creating an extensive inventory of historic resources in Charleston County, one that consists of both NRHP-listed properties and locally designated sites.

BEGINNING AND ENDING DATES OF SURVEY

The project began with a kick-off meeting with the Charleston County planning department staff, South Carolina Department of Archives and History (SCDAH), and New South Associates on November 24, 2015 to discuss the survey's parameters and schedule. Attendees were Andrea Harris-Long and Andrea Pietras of the Charleston County Zoning and Planning Department, David Kent who is the chair of the Planning Commission Historic Preservation Committee, Brad Sauls from SCDAH, and Mary Beth Reed and Summer Ciomek of New South Associates. A public workshop was held on February 16, 2016 at the Lonnie Hamilton, III Public Services Building in North Charleston. The meeting presented general information about the goals of the project and solicited public input regarding the history and architecture of unincorporated Charleston County.

Historical research was conducted in Columbia during January 2016. Fieldwork began on March 1, 2016 and was completed on April 7, 2016. During the fieldwork, meetings were held with leaders and community members of the Phillips, Snowden, and Sol Legare communities. Production of the survey forms and photographs began in March 2016, while the writing of the survey report started in May 2016. A public meeting to present the results and recommendations of this survey was held on August 31, 2016 at the Lonnie Hamilton, III Public Services Building in North Charleston.

II. PROJECT OBJECTIVES

The primary purpose of the project is to update Charleston County's historic resources inventory. The Historic Preservation Committee in the Charleston County Planning Commission was established in 2014 to better identify ways to preserve and enhance the history of Charleston County and carry out strategies identified in the cultural resources section of the county's comprehensive plan. The comprehensive plan stipulated that the county's historic resources inventory needed to be updated, as the last countywide survey was completed in 1992. The survey update will also help guide future initiatives set forth by the Historic Preservation Commission and project planning within the county. In 2015, Charleston County was awarded a grant from the National Park Service (NPS), administered by SCDAH, to conduct an intensive historic resources survey of 1,200 properties that focused on resources dating between 1940 and 1975 within the unincorporated areas of Charleston County. The data compiled by the project is intended to help identify individual properties or districts eligible for local designation or listing in the NRHP. The historic context and subsequent survey also identify potential historic themes to pursue in future studies and provide Charleston County and SCDAH with information needed for planning and preservation initiatives.

During the public workshop in February, leaders and members from Charleston County's historic African American communities sought to have their communities documented during the survey. Their interest in the project arose from growing concerns over rapid development and increasing property taxes, which reduced the communities' size, eroding their culture. A new project objective was created out of their desire to preserve and protect their communities, giving the project a second focus on Charleston County's African American communities, their history, culture, and significance.

III. SURVEY METHODOLOGY

BACKGROUND RESEARCH AND FIELD METHODOLOGY

The project began with research conducted in Columbia, South Carolina at the South Carolina State Library, as well as the South Caroliniana and Thomas Cooper libraries, both located on the campus of the University of South Carolina. Research was also conducted at SCDAH's History Center. The purpose of this initial research was to develop major historical themes and events of the early to mid-twentieth century that shaped Charleston County. Historic maps, obtained at the University of South Carolina's map library, were examined to identify settlement and development patterns within the county.

PREVIOUS STUDIES

Several historic resources surveys have been conducted in Charleston County. Countywide surveys in 1973 and 1983 were conducted to identify NRHP-eligible properties and districts. In 1989, Preservation Consultants completed a historic resource survey of James and Johns islands. They recorded a total of 330 properties, 201 on James Island and 129 on Johns Island.

In 1992, Preservation Consultants conducted a historic resources survey of Charleston County. The majority of the county was covered during the survey (approximately 640 square miles), excluding the North Charleston area, Isle of Palms, and sections of the Francis Marion National Forest, as well as previously surveyed areas on Johns Island and James Island. The survey recorded 592 properties all constructed prior to 1942.

A 1995 survey was also conducted by Preservation Consultants and documented the North Charleston area that was excluded from the 1992 county survey. The survey recorded 2,706 properties constructed between circa 1820 and circa 1945.

In 2009, New South Associates completed a cultural resources survey of U.S. 17 between SC-517 and Darrell Creek Trail as part of a road-widening project proposed along U.S. 17 north of Mount Pleasant. In addition to the archaeological testing and historic building survey, the sweetgrass basket stands corridor was evaluated as a potential traditional cultural property (TCP) and cultural landscape. There were 63 sweetgrass basket stands along U.S. 17 documented and brief oral interviews were conducted with the basket makers operating the stands. It was found that the sweetgrass basket corridor met the qualifying standards of what the NPS defined as a TCP. It was also recommended that the sweetgrass basket corridor was an important cultural landscape associated with Mount Pleasant and the African American communities located along the U.S. 17 corridor, both as a vernacular and ethnographic landscape.

During the sweetgrass basket corridor study, New South Associates collaborated with Cari Goetcheus, a professor at Clemson University, who was in the midst of a two-year study of the East Cooper Historic African American communities. The goal was to document the buildings, gardens, and maritime forest ecology of the communities. In addition to background literature research, the project conducted oral histories with community members, created maps defining the historic and current community boundaries (Figure 2) and completed surveys of the Village, Remley's Point/Scanlonville, Greenhill/Sparkshill, Snowden, Two Mile, Four Mile, Six Mile, Seven Mile/Hamlin, and Ten Mile. Fifteen Mile and Phillips communities participated in the study, but their communities were not surveyed. South Carolina State Survey Forms were completed but never submitted to SCDAH.

NATIONAL REGISTER OF HISTORIC PLACES EVALUATION

The resources documented during the survey were evaluated for their potential eligibility for listing on the NRHP. The NRHP is the official register of resources that are historically and/or architecturally significant. Cultural resources can be defined as significant if they are 50 years of age or older and “possess integrity of location, design, setting, materials, workmanship, feeling, and association.” Resources are evaluated under four criteria, as outlined in the Department of Interior Regulations 36 CFR Part 60.4: National Register of Historic Places Criteria for Evaluation and in 36 CFR Part 800, Advisory Council on Historic Preservation, Protection of Historic and Cultural Properties. The four criteria are:

- A) Properties that are associated with events that have made a significant contribution to the broad pattern of history;
- B) Properties that are associated with the lives of persons significant in the past;
- C) Properties that embody the distinctive characteristics of a type, period, or method of construction, or represent the work of a master, possess high artistic values, or represent a significant and distinguishable entity whose components may lack individual distinction; or,
- D) Properties that have yielded, or may be likely to yield, information important in prehistory or history.

Criteria A, B and C are usually applied to architectural resources, while archaeological sites are generally evaluated relative to Criterion D.

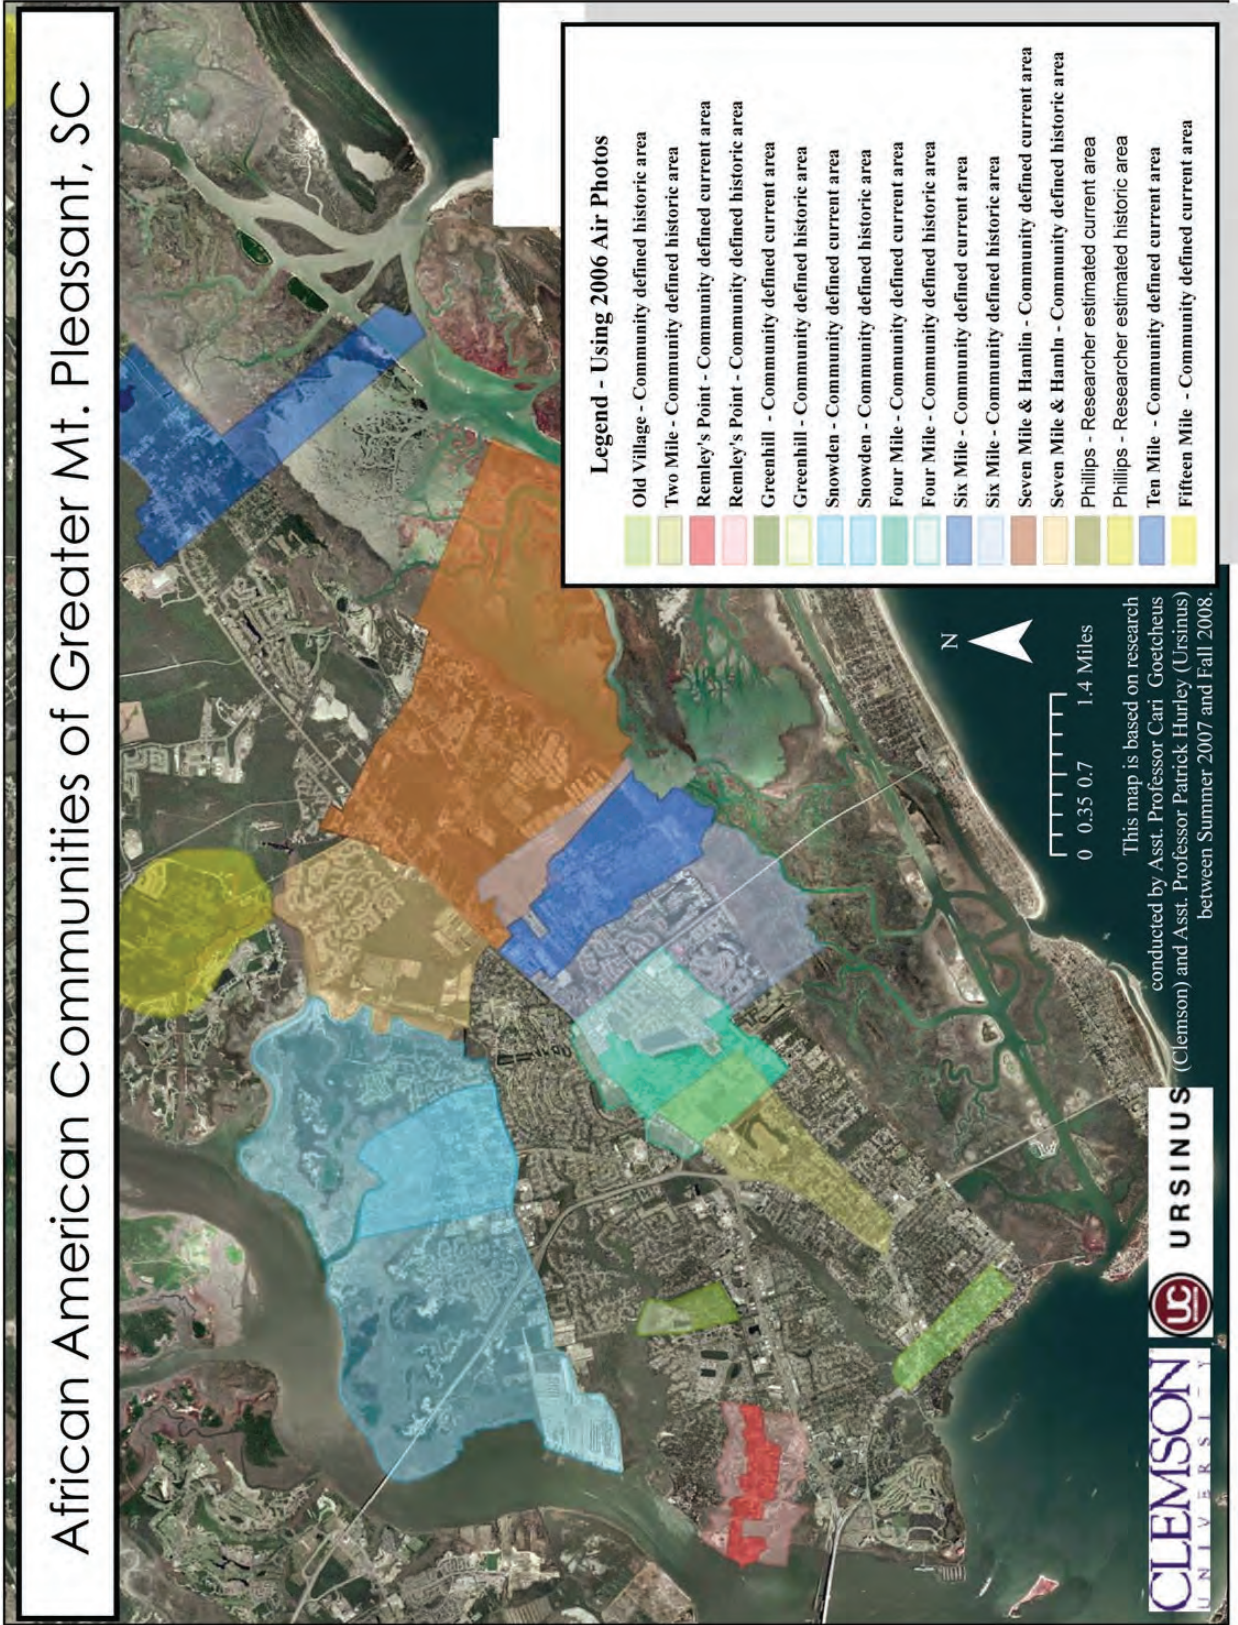

Figure 2.
African American Communities of Greater Mount Pleasant

The survey was conducted from the public right-of-way and all eligibility assessments were based on exterior architectural details, setting, outbuildings, and other features visible from the public right-of-way. Survey forms and photographs, which meet NRHP archival standards, were produced for SCDAH and the Charleston County Zoning and Planning Department.

IV. HISTORIC CONTEXT

Charleston County lies in the southeastern section of South Carolina, stretching approximately 90 miles along the Atlantic Ocean between the South Santee River at the north end of the county down to the mouth of the Edisto River (see Figure 1). The coast is comprised of a chain of islands, which provide a natural barrier, and a number of small inlets and bays, including Charleston Harbor. The islands include, north to south, Isle of Palms, Sullivan's, James, Folly Beach, Johns, Wadmalaw, Seabrook, and Edisto islands. The City of Charleston, the largest city in the county and currently second largest in the state, is positioned on a peninsula between the Ashley and Cooper rivers, which flow into Charleston Harbor. The Francis Marion National Forest occupies the majority of the northeastern half of the county, as do the towns of McClellanville, Awendaw, and Mount Pleasant. The Sea Islands, including James, Johns, Wadmalaw, Kiawah, and Edisto, comprise most of the southwestern portion of the county, which is also dotted by small towns, such as Hollywood, Ravenel, and Meggett.

British colonists landed on the coast of South Carolina in 1670 near the present day location of Charleston. The natural harbor and many rivers provided protection and transportation routes for trade. The climate and soils of the Sea Islands afforded an excellent area for agriculture, for both staple and cash crops. Indigo was the colony's first cash crop before switching to rice and eventually long-strand Sea Island cotton, the profitable cultivation of which was not possible without the use of slave labor. The area was heavily damaged during the Civil War and this, coupled with the subsequent end of slavery forced South Carolinians to restructure their economy and society. The citizens of Charleston County – white and black – spent the remainder of the nineteenth century rebuilding and adjusting their lives.

A great number of these South Carolinians were freedmen and women who sought to control their own destiny within a familiar geography. The physical impress of their efforts began during Reconstruction and remains intact today particularly in unincorporated Charleston County where well preserved historic African American communities stretch from the northern reaches of the county to its southernmost point. Understanding the form, character, and history of this distinct cultural landscape needs to start with a discussion of the events and practices that continue to characterize the county's African American communities in the modern era.

ORIGINS OF GULLAH CULTURE AND GROWTH OF THE LOWCOUNTRY RICE PLANTATION ECONOMY

The histories of the slaves who worked the Lowcountry rice and indigo plantations of coastal South Carolina were often very different from those slave communities in other parts of the South who arrived via generations living in the West Indies and worked the large cotton estates of the inland Piedmont. More than 120,000 enslaved West Africans were brought in chains directly to the United States through the port of Charleston as part of the British transatlantic slave trade, which thrived in South Carolina from the late eighteenth through the early nineteenth centuries. Descendants in the traditional African American Gullah communities of Charleston County, South Carolina typically trace their ancestry to the mix of cultures where white rice planters often had a preference for slaves from rice-growing regions along Africa's Windward Coast Region that includes Angola, Senegambia, and Sierra Leone (Edgar 1998:64–65). Most Gullah lived in isolated plantation communities along the coastline, where slaves vastly outnumbered whites, which provided a sense of independence and made it easier for many to retain their African cultural and community traditions associated with language dialects, foodways, oral history, religious practices, and tool making (Cross 2008:16–17; Vinson 2004:5–8).

Between 1700 and 1775, approximately 40 percent of all Africans brought to the United States entered through Charleston's harbor. The emergence of the naval stores industry followed by improvements in tidal irrigation methods for rice and indigo production in the 1750s are credited with providing the economic impetus for the growth of the slave trade in South Carolina during the eighteenth century (Edgar 1998:66–67). By the eve of the Revolutionary War, the slave-based rice economy had come to dominate agricultural production along the South Carolina and Georgia coasts (Figure 3). Rice production in South Carolina alone jumped from 12,000 pounds in 1698 to 83 million pounds by 1770. While Sea Island cotton emerged as the primary cash crop for coastal plantations in Georgia and the small zone south of Charleston in the aftermath of the Revolutionary War, rice continued to hold its primacy throughout Charleston County and most of South Carolina's Lowcountry region until the outbreak of the Civil War (National Park Service, U.S. Department of the Interior 2005:28–29).

THE CIVIL WAR, EMANCIPATION, AND RECONSTRUCTION – 1860-1900

Shortly after the start of the Civil War in the fall of 1861, the Union Army gained control of the town of Beaufort and the Sea Islands as Confederate forces ceded control of the lower South Carolina coast to concentrate its defenses around Charleston. Finding themselves defenseless in the face of Union raids, white landowners on Charleston County's barrier islands and along the coast, abandoned their plantations early in the war, placed them in the care of trusted older slave overseers, and retreated inland with their families (Frazier 2007:131). Despite President Abraham Lincoln's 1863 issue of the Emancipation Proclamation abolishing slavery in Confederate slave-holding states, most slaves in Charleston County and in other non-Union occupied areas throughout South Carolina, remained on their former owners' plantations over the course of the war (Edgar 1998:362–367).

Union General William T. Sherman's capture of Savannah, Georgia on December 22, 1864 completed his Army of the Tennessee's vaunted March to the Sea. The following month on January 16, 1865, Sherman issued his Special Field Order 15, which called for the reservation of a 30-mile swath of coastline and barrier islands for African American freedmen between Charleston, South Carolina and the St. Johns River in Florida. The order prohibited whites from living on the barrier islands and mandated the redistribution of nearly 400,000 acres of former plantation land. The head of each freedman family in these areas was promised 40 acres of farmable land along with a surplus Army mule, where feasible (Williamson 1965:59–60). To assist with these efforts, the U.S. Congress established the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, commonly known as the "Freedmen's Bureau," in March 1865 to "Give the freedmen protection, land and schools as far and as fast as he can" (National Park Service, U.S. Department of the Interior 2005:47–48).

Sherman turned his army into South Carolina in late January 1865, cutting a northeastern swath through the state with the goal of uniting with Lieutenant General Ulysses S. Grant's Army of the Potomac in Virginia. Columbia, the state capitol, fell to Union forces on February 17, 1865. Following its surrender, the city was systematically sacked and burned to the ground. The cities of Charleston, South Carolina and Wilmington, North Carolina fell shortly thereafter. General Joseph E. Johnston's formally surrendered his remaining Confederate forces to Sherman on April 26, 1865, finally bringing an end to the war (Swanson 2004:106–108).

No longer forced to work the land, large numbers of freed slaves drifted away from the plantations in the weeks after the collapse of the Confederate Army in the spring of 1865. Many of the freedmen and women from throughout the state also flocked to Union-occupied Charleston in search of work and safety (Edgar 1998:379). At the time of the 1860 U.S. Census enumeration, just prior to the start of the Civil War, Charleston County's African American population stood at 40,912 residents (combined "free colored" and slaves). By 1870, the county's population had jumped 32 percent, the most significant increase of any county in the state, with African Americans accounting for 68 percent (n=60,603) of the county's total residents (Taylor 1969:6–7).

The twin effects of war and migration of the African American populace effectively hobbled the Lowcountry's rice-based agricultural economy. An 1865 survey of the area conducted by agents with the Freedmen's Bureau, also found "nearly all" the plantations were abandoned by whites but "to some extent occupied by freedmen, 'bred and born' on the spot" (Vinson 2004:12; Williamson 1965:100–101). According to the Freedmen's Bureau report, production had stopped on 43 of the 52 rice plantations along the Cooper River, just north of Charleston by 1866, and even fewer remained in operation in the following two years. Labor shortages, hurricanes and the emergence of alternative cash crops would eventually bring an end to rice production in the region by the 1880s (Williamson 1965:106–107).

AFRICAN AMERICAN SETTLEMENT PATTERNS DURING RECONSTRUCTION

In September 1865, President Andrew Johnson reversed Sherman's Special Field Orders Number 15, effectively forcing the newly freed slaves off their 40-acre claims and returning the land to the former plantation owners (National Park Service, U.S. Department of the Interior 2005:47–48). Strongly bound to the land they and their ancestors had worked in bondage for centuries, the newly emancipated African American residents of Charleston County, like those in other parts of South Carolina throughout the South, understood that ownership of land was an important step toward economic independence and political equality. In the tumultuous years of South Carolina's Reconstruction period from 1865-1877, Gullah freedmen used various methods available to them to acquire their lands. These post-bellum patterns of land ownership, distribution, and settlement continue to define the character and history of historic African American communities in Charleston County today (Cross 2008:18–19).

Freedmen's Plantation Settlements

A large number of freedmen and women also returned to the rural, outlying areas of Charleston County in 1865 and 1866. The freedmen established their own communities, sometimes exchanging labor for land on or near the same plantations where they had only recently lived and worked as slaves. Most cultivated the long-staple cotton of the white, Lowcountry planters on a part-time basis through wage-based labor contracts organized by the Freedmen's Bureau. Records show that Freedmen's Bureau field officers facilitated numerous labor contracts between white landowners and African American freedmen in Charleston County between 1865 and 1867, including harvesting agreements at: Dr. Joseph Murray's Argyle Plantation along Goose Creek; Samuel King's coastal plantation at Church Flats; the agricultural estate of D.B. Hayward; the "Grimball Place" on James Island; and the B. H. Read Plantation on the Cooper River (Lowcountry Africana 2016). In many cases, however, the Freedmen's Bureau contracts were often made in favor of white landowners and were detrimental to the African American laborers they were supposed to represent (Taylor 1969:26–28).

The Seabrook and Grimball plantations on James Island appear to be two examples where former slaves farmed the land and managed to acquire land either through proclamation, barter or trade based on labor, or outright purchase (Figure 4). Most likely, land was acquired over time through a combination of these methods of conveyance. According to local resident Aida White Moore, whose father and grandfather were born into slavery, former slaves continued to live in a cluster of slave cottages on the Seabrook Plantation, known as the Whitehouse section, after the Civil War and land was given by Janie Seabrook to former slaves for the construction of their church, which is now known as the Payne RMUE Church on Camp Road. The Whaley Family was among the first African American families to purchase land on the Grimball Plantation after the war, when Henry Whaley, Sr. bought 10 acres of land along the Stono River for $70 (Frazier 2007:84, 145–148). By 1880, freedmen had acquired nearly 10 percent of the land (n=1,600 acres) of the Grimball Plantation (Graves 2010:45–46).

Cooperative Land Company Settlements

The newly emancipated African American residents of Charleston County, like those in other parts of South Carolina, quickly realized land ownership was the key to political and possibly later, economic, equality. While most freedmen lacked the individual capital to purchase property, a few enterprising groups in counties such as Charleston and Clarendon with large African American populations, banded together to form cooperative societies for the purchase of former white-owned plantation lands. Historian Carol K. Rothrock Bleser, described the cooperatives as:

...composed principally of freedmen who worked for hire. Dues were collected; when sufficient capital had been accumulated the members of the society selected a plantation and began the payments, usually spread over a three-year period. The land was distributed equally among the members of the society; each member was free to work as it suite him and could dispose of his crop as he deemed proper. All that was required of a member was the prompt payment of his dues (Bleser and South Carolina Tricentennial Commission 1969:17–18).

Described by the Charleston News & Courier newspaper as “Colored Communism,” Charleston County was home to at least four of these cooperative land ventures during early Reconstruction. Some of these freedmen associations proved unsuccessful, such as the Atlantic Land Company, which failed in its attempts to acquire property on Bull’s Island. Others gave rise to prominent African American communities that have remained intact into the twenty-first century. The Scanlonville Community, near Mount Pleasant, was established in 1868 after 100 freedmen subscribers of the Charleston Land Company, under the direction of Robert L. Scanlon, purchased 614 acres of the Remley Plantation at auction for $6,100. The former plantation tract was rechristened “Scanlonville” and platted in 1870 into 394 half-acre “town lots” (100x200 feet), 111 vacant lots, and 100 linear, two-acre “farm lots” (130x650 feet). The new African American settlement also included parcels for a community park and cemetery. In addition to its real estate duties, the company also presided over: farming issues in the communities; settled disputes between shareholders/subscribers; operated a mutual benefit fund for sick members; and possibly also managed the community cemetery and burial of the dead. The Charleston Land Company remained a viable corporation until 1932, maintaining communal property and selling unsold parcels within Scanlonville; however, African American ownership of the land has passed down through the generations despite recent pressure brought on by encroaching real estate development (Bleser and South Carolina Tricentennial Commission 1969:18–19; Trinkley and Chicora Foundation Inc. 2001:9–13).

Similar land cooperative acquisitions were conducted on Edisto Island during the 1870s. In 1872, John Thorne, an African American businessman from Charleston, managed the purchase of 750 acres of planter Ephraim Baynard’s “Seaside” Plantation for $5,000. The former plantation land was renamed “Freedmen’s Village,” subdivided into 10- and 25-acre parcels, and distributed to 35 stockholders based on their shares. Thorne himself amassed 250 acres of land and by 1880 had become the largest African American cotton producer on Edisto. The Chaplin’s Gardens community, once located on the north side of the island, was another freedmen’s cooperative purchase during this period (Figure 5). Thirty-eight former slaves purchased the former plantation tract of Julia Seabrook and Berwick Legare in 1875 and subdivided the farm land into linear parcels ranging in size from seven to 17 acres (Spencer 2008:113–115, 142).

The South Carolina Land Commission

Despite these tentative steps, land ownership remained elusive for most black South Carolinians in the years following the Civil War, even at a time when African Americans legislators formed a majority in the state’s General Assembly (Williamson 1965). One state representative asserted, “We all know that the colored people want land. Night and day they think and dream of it” (Ransom and Sutch 1977:82). However, the costs to purchase and subdivide the large estates proved beyond the financial wherewithal for most freedmen. Many former plantation owners were unwilling to sell their lands to former slaves due to racial opposition, unwillingness to assume the financial risk, or for both of these reasons. Instead, most white landowners opted to sell to interested Northern companies and real estate speculators (Bleser and South Carolina Tricentennial Commission 1969:17).

Under the leadership of Richard H. Cain, an African American minister and newspaper editor, the Republican-dominated legislature sought to implement a mechanism for landless African American residents to purchase farms through the creation of the South Carolina Land Commission during the 1868 state constitutional convention (Bleser and South Carolina Tricentennial Commission 1969:17–19). Other far-reaching and inclusive reforms to emerge from the state’s Reconstruction-Era constitution included: extending the right to vote to all male residents over the age of 21; making population, rather than senatorial selection, a basis for representation in the state House of Representatives; and creation of the state’s first public school system for black and white students (Edgar 1998:386–389).

The South Carolina Land Commission was directed to purchase, subdivide and sell agricultural property to landless African American freedmen. Between 1869 and 1879, 14,000 black families throughout South Carolina purchased small farms, typically between 10 and 50 acres in size, from the state agency (Botsch et al. 1994:76). The average sizes of tract lots varied between 10 and 25 acres in the Lowcountry. In 1871-1872, the Land Commission purchased and sold over 25,501 acres in Charleston County alone (Bleser and South Carolina Tricentennial Commission 1969:165, 167). Over the course of the late nineteenth century, African Americans purchased acreage through the Land Commission for what would become the Hamlin, Snowden and Phillips communities near Mount Pleasant, among others. The Phillips Community, established in 1878, was developed on a tract of land that had once been part of the larger Laurel Hill and Boone Hall plantations. It was subdivided into 10-acre parcels and sold to 18 freedmen families at a cost of $63 each (National Park Service, U.S. Department of the Interior 2005:89–91).

GULLAH COMMUNITIES AND LAND OWNERSHIP

The physical isolation of most Gullah along coastal South Carolina that had helped to preserve and sustain elements of their African heritage during generations of slavery continued into the emancipation period of the late nineteenth century. Extended family associations, religion, and a strong connection to the land served as the foundations of Gullah cultural traditions in the Lowcountry, which relied on oral history to pass down through the generations. Churches, cemeteries, schools, and later, fraternal lodge halls, served as central landmarks within the tight-knit communities. In addition to the primary use as places of worship, education, or mutual aid societies, these buildings also functioned as social gathering places for recreation or mourning, community meeting halls, and polling places (National Park Service, U.S. Department of the Interior 2005:75; Nickless 2007).

The Gullah landowners in Phillips, Scanlonville, Snowden, Grimball Farms, and other communities in Charleston County typically owned and worked their holdings as families or community groups. Upon their death, the freedmen grantees of the Reconstruction period typically conveyed their deeds of land ownership to their heirs. Over time, multiple heirs to the original grantee held ownership of these parcels. Later named “heirs’ property,” this method of familial ownership, which lacked a clear chain of title to the land, was viewed by African Americans as a protection against white efforts to reclaim the land by pursuing lawsuits against individuals who were late or delinquent in paying their property taxes. Heirs’ property deeds are still held by many African American families on current land parcels in unincorporated Charleston County. These include places such as the Phillips Community, where about half of the parcels are heirs’ property deeds (Cross 2008:78).

Most African American landowners farmed small amounts of subsistence crops, such as rice, corn, sweet potatoes, and vegetables on a portion of the land and cash crops, primarily cotton, on the remainder. Many also fished and worked as contract laborers on nearby plantations to supplement their incomes (Richey and Young 2009). An 1883 report by the South Carolina State Board of Agriculture found that between 15 and 20 percent of lands in the Sea Island area were owned by African Americans and almost all of the agricultural work was cultivated by African Americans, either as owners or tenant laborers (Taylor 1969:58–59).

RACIAL DISENFRANCHISEMENT IN LATE NINETEENTH CENTURY

Despite their overwhelming loss in the Civil War, southern whites remained steadfast in their defiance to African American emancipation and political enfranchisement during Reconstruction. The first impulse among most white South Carolinians and some African Americans was separation of the races. Segregation manifested itself at almost every level of society and in both work and play, and religion and politics. Freed slaves often left white churches to form their own congregations, while whites refused to participate in the Republican-dominated state legislature following the 1868 Constitutional Convention. White intransience toward the efforts of Reconstruction lawmakers to provide emancipated freedmen opportunities for education, voting, and land ownership soon gave way to violence. In the wake of the 1868 constitution, the Ku Klux Klan began terrorizing African American communities and assassinating black and white Republican leaders alike throughout the state (Williamson 1965:276–277; Edgar 1998:382, 397–401).

South Carolina’s white Democrats gave tacit support to the Klan’s reign of terror while also waging a political campaign to paint Republican Governor Daniel H. Chamberlain and black and white members of the Republican-controlled state government as incompetent and terminally corrupt. The South Carolina Land Commission emerged as a common target with southern whites accusing the Commission as an instrument of fraud and an abuse of taxpayer money. A series of financial scandals involving the Commission's overpayment of land considered unfit for farming only exacerbated the attacks (Bleser and South Carolina Tricentennial Commission 1969:68–69; Taylor 1969:165).

The white Democratic counterrevolution against Republican Reconstruction and African American political gains in South Carolina culminated with the contentious election of 1876, which ended with a split popular vote for Democratic candidate Wade Hampton and Republican Daniel H. Chamberlain. The following year, most federal forces were removed from South Carolina as part of the compromise for the contested national election, which saw Rutherford B. Hayes ascend to the office of the presidency in exchange for an end to Reconstruction in the former Confederate states. The white minority under Wade Hampton now controlled the power in South Carolina if not the authority (Williamson 1965:413–415). Over the next 12 years, the Democrats chipped away at the political rights and land reforms for African Americans that were instituted as part of the 1868 Constitution. By 1882, many of the state's black voters were disenfranchised as a result of a series of laws issued by the General Assembly instituting poll taxes, restrictive voter registration laws, and racial gerrymandering. The final blow came with the 1895 state constitutional convention, which instituted Jim Crow segregation laws throughout the state and made political disenfranchisement of black South Carolinians a central aim (Edgar 1998:414–415, 444–445).

To adhere to the new Jim Crow order of racial separation, the South Carolina 1895 Constitution also mandated separate public schools for white and black children. While county and state funding for public education was scarce for both white and black students during the early twentieth century, the conditions for African American schools, particularly in rural areas, were considerably worse during this period (Taylor 1969:102). African American schoolhouses were often small, poorly constructed one-or-two room wood frame buildings that were poorly heated during the cold winter months. In Charleston County, as other parts of South Carolina and the South, African American communities relied heavily on local churches and missionary societies (including: the New England Freedmen's Aid Society; the Negro Rural School Fund, aka the Jeanes Fund; and the Rosenwald School Program) in the Northeast and Midwest to finance teachers' salaries, obtain books and supplies, and construct the schoolhouses themselves (Dobrasko 2005:7) (Figure 6).

As Charleston County's rural black residents entered the new century, most were farmers living in African American communities that featured a very different settlement pattern than had previously existed. The county's Jim Crow laws grew more pervasive, denying African Americans their basic civil rights and segregating the county's residents.

EARLY TWENTIETH CENTURY – 1900-1940

Both African American and white Charleston County residents were gripped by dramatic social change at the onset of the twentieth century: changes in the local economy, changes in the ways residents and visitors moved through the area, and changes in population and social organization. As expressed in Lesesne's 1931 work, History of Charleston County South Carolina, as planters attempted to resurrect their livelihoods, they "had to face strange labor conditions; the slaves were slaves no longer" (Lesesne 1931). The Lowcountry – especially Charleston – was reluctant to change its lifeways and was resistant to adopt the growth and industrialism that came along with the "New South."

The Reconstruction-era Lowcountry did have a brief foray into the mining industry, as Charleston was the center of a short-lived phosphate fertilizer mining and manufacturing boom. The county possessed large, easily-mined phosphate deposits along the Ashley, Stono, and Cooper rivers. Although these deposits were well known, the resource was not exploited until after the Civil War, when new technologies were developed to turn phosphate into a fertilizer that could readily be absorbed by plants (Shuler and Bailey 2004). The first phosphate mining company in the state, the Charleston Mining and Manufacturing Company, was established by Francis Holmes and Dr. N.A. Pratt in 1868 (Trinkley et al. 2006). The company purchased the majority of the available land deposits along the Cooper and Ashley rivers and leased upwards of 10,000 acres of former rice plantations on the Ashley River. The number of mining and manufacturing plants in the county increased quickly, as use of phosphate-based fertilizers increased through the 1870s and 1880s. The rise of the phosphate industry brought hopes for economic renewal in the economically depressed South. The industry grew quickly and was very profitable, in part due to the fact that a portion of its labor force came from the inmate-leasing program of the South Carolina State Penitentiary, as well as from Irish and Italian immigrants. By 1885, South Carolina was producing approximately half of the world's phosphate (Shuler and Bailey 2004). The industry was short-lived and by the late 1880s, South Carolina's phosphate industry began to wane. The discovery of higher-grade phosphate deposits in Florida and Tennessee coupled with increased government regulation and the destruction caused by the earthquake of 1886 caused the rapid decline of Charleston County's phosphate industry. Very little mining occurred through the beginning of the twentieth century, with none since 1938 (Shuler and Bailey 2004). A few small-scale fertilizer manufacturers did continue through the early twentieth century. Although a short-lived industry in Charleston County, phosphate mining had destructive, long-term effects on the environment and society, particularly in the West Ashley area (Exchange Club of St. Andrew's Parish 1943).

Agriculture was still a major component of the state's economy, just under a different manifestation. In 1910, Charleston County had a total of 3,403 farms, of which 210 were owned by whites and 1,320 owned by black South Carolinians (University of Virginia, Geospatial and Statistical Data Center 2014). Over half of the farms in the county were operated by tenants (University of Virginia, Geospatial and Statistical Data Center 2014). Initially, planters on the coast returned to rice agriculture, which was met with little success. The new generation of black laborers did not possess the same knowledge of and experience with rice cultivation as the black slaves who preceded them (Edgar 1998). Competition from abroad drove down rice prices, and paying wages to laborers cut into profits. A series of seven hurricanes battered the South Carolina coast between 1893 and 1911, causing severe damage to the rice fields and destroying crops. Unable to fully recover, rice production in Charleston County came to an end.

Many farmers continued to profitably grow cotton, especially on Kiawah and Edisto islands, because the long-staple Sea Island cotton could fetch higher prices than short-staple upland cotton (Figure 7a). The high cotton prices continued until the summer of 1914 with the beginning of World War I. The European markets disappeared, and cotton prices dropped (Edgar 1998). However, the market quickly bounced back when long-staple Egyptian cotton became contained at Egyptian ports, increasing demand and prices for long-staple cotton to make fabric for airplane wings (Spencer 2008). When the United States entered the war in 1917, cotton prices skyrocketed (Edgar 1998). Acreages of farmland planted in cotton continued to increase as the prices remained high into the 1920s; however, the prosperity did not last long. The boll weevil reached South Carolina in 1917. For the next four years, planters exhausted all options to keep the boll weevil at bay with no success. Even the use of potent insecticides, including dusting plants with the arsenic-based powder Paris Green, did not halt the boll weevils' destruction of the fibrous plant (Spencer 2008). In 1920, only 265 bales of Sea Island cotton were harvested from all the islands, down from over 3,000 bales harvested the previous year. The Sea Island cotton crop was wiped out in 1921 and never recovered. Although upland cotton slowly made a comeback after the boll weevil infestation, Sea Island cotton never did; the strain was permanently lost.

Truck farming emerged as a prominent aspect of the county's agricultural economy. Farmers began planting vegetables, often as a sideline, to take to market as early as the late 1860s, tempted by the high prices for produce offered in the northern markets (Lesesne 1931). As the boll weevil wiped out the last remaining cotton fields, many farmers turned their efforts to the commercial production of food crops and dairy or beef cattle (Jordan and Stringfellow 1998). Truck farming blossomed in the county during the early twentieth century, taking advantage of an increasing demand for produce and a developing transportation network. For example, in West Ashley, the Old Charleston and Savannah Railway, which was acquired by the Plant System in 1880 and which became part of the Atlantic Coastline Railway (ACL) in 1902, ran from Croghan to Savannah. In 1882, the Plant System constructed new trackage from the John's Island station aligning it with the historic route of Bees Ferry Road, known as Croghans Spur

(now the West Ashley Greenway). The ACL Trestle on this route, still in use today, was built across the Ashley River, allowing AVL trains to enter Charleston from the north. Truck farmers and businesses used this trackage, which linked about 15 stops/communities, between Johns Island to Croghan until about 1974 (Cain 2009).

Tomatoes, potatoes, snap beans, cucumbers, watermelon, and cabbage thrived on the Sea Islands, West Ashley, and the interior of the county (Jordan and Stringfellow 1998; Murray 1949). Despite finding reliable crops, farmers often experimented growing various cash crops. For example, the farmers on Edisto Island found that corn, oats, and rye grew successfully; however, their experiments with pecans and sugar cane were not as successful and, therefore, were short-lived (Spencer 2008). The Town of Meggett, due to its railroad depot, became known as the center of Charleston County's truck farming industry (Lesesne 1931). During the growing season, tomatoes, radishes, potatoes, and cabbage would ship daily from the Meggett depot, which soon earned the title as the Cabbage Capital of the World (Figure 7b) (Town of Meggett 2014). Some farmers also kept livestock, primarily cattle and hogs, in addition to producing row crops; attempts at raising commercial poultry, however, were not successful in Charleston County.

Timber production was another important aspect of Charleston County's early twentieth-century economy. Having begun after the Civil War, the timber industry expanded at the turn of the century and acquired large tracts of forest and forested former rice and cotton fields (Preservation Consultants, Inc. 1992). Three large mills were established along the Cooper River: the North State Lumber Company, established in 1900; the A.C. Tuxbury Lumber Company, established in 1905; and the Burton Lumber Company, established in 1904. By 1913, there were seven lumber mills in and near the City of Charleston (Preservation Consultants, Inc. 1995). Smaller sawmills and turpentine stills operated along rail lines and waterways throughout the county. The West Virginia Pulp and Paper Company opened a paper mill on the Cooper River in 1936, having already owned upwards of 300,000 acres of timberland in South Carolina. The West Virginia Pulp and Paper Company found the new mill location provided a combination of favorable qualities, including the presence of nearby timberland, an abundant fresh water supply, convenient railroads, river access, and a deep river channel (Preservation Consultants, Inc. 1995). The same features along the Cooper River also attracted the General Asbestos and Rubber Company, fertilizer manufacturers, oil refiners, and the Oakdene Compress Company, which received cotton and compressed it into large bales for shipment to mills along the bank of the Cooper River (Preservation Consultants, Inc. 1995).

However, the largest industry in the county at the beginning of the twentieth century was the naval yard established by the United States Navy on the west bank of the Cooper River (Preservation Consultants, Inc. 1992). Upon receiving news of the United States Navy's dissatisfaction with the base at Port Royal, South Carolina, the mayor of Charleston, James Adger Smyth, formally requested that the Navy transfer the Port Royal Naval Station to Charleston. With the assistance of Senator Ben Tillman, Mayor Smyth lobbied Admiral Mordecai J. Endicott, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, to relocate the naval yard on the Cooper River to north of the City of Charleston. The Federal Government eventually purchased three tracts of land, including Chicora Park, designed by the Olmstead Brothers in 1896, totaling 1,189 acres (Preservation Consultants, Inc. 1995).

Construction of the Charleston Naval Yard began in 1902 and was finished in 1909 with the completion of the stone dry dock and the brick buildings that housed the yard's shops and offices (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). The naval yard was originally comprised of a forge shop, shipfitters shop, machine shop, joiners shop, and a dry dock (Figure 8a). The base received a steady stream of work until World War I, when its mission, and the yard itself, expanded to meet its new missions, such as specialized supply, training, weapons storage, and medical care (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). At the conclusion of World War I, the United States Navy rapidly demobilized and was down-sized, almost causing the closure of the Charleston Naval Yard. Its status as the Navy's southern-most naval yard on the east coast kept the base open and operational, and Work Projects Administration and Public Works Administration projects improved and modernized its facilities. At this time, the naval yard was assigned minesweeper upkeep and, by the 1930s, the Charleston Naval Base established itself as a minesweeping center (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). The development of the naval yard and the other industrial locations along the Cooper River not only brought jobs to Charleston County, but also spurred residential development. Capitalizing on the need for housing close to the naval yard and manufacturing plants, developers purchased large tracts of land, subdivided the land, and sold these parcels to either individuals or development companies to construct houses according to the standards outlined in the covenant (Preservation Consultants, Inc. 1995). Prior to 1940, seven residential developments were laid out, including Chicora Place in 1904, Charleston Heights in 1918, and Ferndale in 1919. The largest of these developments was Olde North Charleston, which was a 1,516-acre tract two miles north of the naval yard. The development was laid out like a city, with residential, commercial, and industrial zoning and included a school and a railroad station.

The oyster and shrimp industries, although small in scale, were important to the economies of the communities located on the county's long, expansive coast. These industries flourished in the first half of the twentieth century, with the number of oyster factories increasing along the South Carolina coast until the onset of World War II. In the 1920s, there were 10 oyster factories in operation in Charleston County: the Varn and Byrd Company on Yonges Island; two factories in McClellanville; the Shelmore Oyster Company in Awendaw; three factories in Mount Pleasant; one in the City of Charleston; one on Folly Beach; and the Flowers Oyster Factory on Edisto Island, which also started a packing plant on Folly Beach (Figure 8b) (Burrell 2003). These factories were located on the waterfront for easier unloading of the oyster harvest for processing and easier loading of the empty shells back onto boats for planting. In the warm months, many oyster companies would trawl for shrimp or use their facilities to can vegetables and shrimp (Burrell 2003). The oyster shells were most often used as substrate, or cultch, for future oyster settlements but were sometimes sold for agriculture lime, poultry feed supplement, road construction, or septic tank drain fields (Burrell 2003).

Improvements in the state's transportation networks provided the means for the profitability of Charleston County's truck farming industry and were a draw to manufacturers. By the 1920s, three major railroad lines – Southern Railway, Atlantic Coast Line, and Seaboard Air Line – traversed Charleston County (Lewis 2016). The Southern Railway was the former South Carolina Railroad line that connected Charleston to Augusta and points west, while the Atlantic Coast Line ran northeast-southwest, connecting Charleston with the towns of Ravenel and Osborn on its route to Savannah. The Seaboard Air Line Railway, incorporated in 1892, entered the Charleston County market through the acquisitions of the Raleigh & Charleston Railroad in 1911 and the Carolina, Atlantic, & Western Railway in 1915 (Lewis 2016). The company quickly constructed a new line from Charleston to Savannah in order to compete with Southern Railway and Atlantic Coast Line. The new Seaboard Air Line Railway route, which was completed in 1918, constructed a branch line across the Stono River to connect Johns Island to the mainland. The arrival of the railroad allowed truck farmers to have easier and quicker access to markets beyond the immediate area. During the heyday of truck farming, small, independent produce sheds sprung up next to railroad stations and provided a place for farmers to sell their produce. Eventually, the smaller produce sheds were abandoned for a larger, consolidated produce operation constructed at the DuPont station, located where the Atlantic Coast Line and the Seaboard Air Line cross (Figure 9a). Constructed in 1939 with assistance from the South Carolina Agricultural Society, the consolidation ensured that all truck farmers in area received the same price for their produce.

U.S. 17, now known as Savannah Highway, is the primary artery connecting the northern end of Charleston County to the southern end. The road came into existence when the Charleston Bridge Company was chartered by an act of the South Carolina Legislature on December 17, 1808 to construct a bridge over the Ashley River to connect Saint Philip and Saint Andrews parishes. The charter also gave the Charleston Bridge Company the authority to establish a turnpike road from the terminus of the bridge in Saint Andrews parish to what is now known as Wappoo Road. The charter was without limit of duration but required both bridge and road to be completed within seven years and also allowed the company to operate a ferry service until the bridge was constructed. The first bridge was completed in 1810 and soon was destroyed by a hurricane in 1813. Its replacement was completed in 1856 and was burned by Confederate troops during the Civil War. A third wooden bridge was eventually constructed in 1886.

Following the establishment of the South Carolina Highway Department in 1917, road building and improvements increased throughout Charleston County. As local transportation taxes and federal funding increased, more of the county's principle thoroughfares were paved and improved, facilitating travel and commerce. In 1918, the first section of road the county paved was a stretch of "Cosgrove Avenue to the West Gate of the Navy Yard, a distance of less than a mile" (Lesesne 1931). By 1930, Charleston County had more than 600 miles of improved roadways and had connected its principal islands to the mainland via multiple bridges (Lesesne 1931). Approved in 1926, U.S. 17 passed through Charleston from the north via Florence and Marion on route to Savannah (Figure 10). Also known as the Coastal Highway, the road ran from eastern Canada to the Florida Keys. Charleston County collaborated financially with Berkeley and Williamsburg counties to promptly improve and pave the sections of U.S. 17 running through their respective counties, as well as to construct a new bridge over the Santee River (Lesesne 1931). Such efforts to pave and improve the state's roads were lauded nationally, as when The New York Times praised South Carolina's highways in the fall of 1930, noting that U.S. 17 was paved, in its entirety, from North Carolina to Georgia (Moore 1987).

The 1920s also marked a period of bridge building, as easier and more efficient access to the Sea Islands was increasingly necessary. By 1926, all the Sea Islands were connected to the mainland and each other by at least one bridge. In the same year, the Ashley River Memorial Bridge, dedicated to South Carolina's deceased soldiers from World War I, replaced the 1886 wooden bridge that connected West Ashley to the peninsula. The new concrete and steel bridge made West Ashley a desirable place for new residential development. By 1930, West Ashley had six new suburban residential developments, including Wappoo Heights (1924), Windermere (1926), The Crescent (1926), Saint Andrews Heights (1928), Stono Park (1928), and Pinecrest Gardens (1929) (Robert and Company 2009a).

The year 1926 also saw construction begin on a bridge that would span the Cooper River between the City of Charleston and Mount Pleasant. The Cooper River Bridge opened with much fanfare on August 18, 1929, including a large parade marching across the bridge (see Figure 9b). Constructed as a toll bridge by a corporation in Chicago, the bridge cost six million dollars to build and consisted of two spans that were a total of 2.7 miles in length (Moore 1987). At the time, the Cooper River Bridge was the third longest bridge in the country and the fifth longest in the world (Moore 1987). The Cooper River Bridge provided quicker and easier travel between Charleston and Mount Pleasant via automobile, rendering ferry service obsolete. The county was eventually able to purchase the bridge in September of 1941 and renamed it the John P. Grace Memorial Bridge.

Charleston County's infrastructure improvements coincided with the beginning of the automobile age. The improved roads and connectivity drew the county's growth and development outward from the city to the north side of Charleston harbor and the surrounding Sea Islands. U.S. 17 was rerouted in 1935 to the Grand Strand, passing through the City of Georgetown, over the South Santee River, into Charleston County, past McClellanville and Awendaw, and through Mount Pleasant. As one of the most popular routes between New York and Miami, tourists funneled through Mount Pleasant year-round, creating a steady tourism economy for the small village.

Charleston County's African American residents also began taking advantage of the tourist traffic along U.S. 17 by offering coiled sea grass baskets in stands along the road. Used for centuries as a utilitarian item and rooted in African techniques and style that had been passed down through family relationships, the craft of basket weaving took on a new life in the early 1900s as a marketable art form and automobile tourist attraction for many of the county's African American communities during the first decades of the twentieth century (Gibbs 2006:35). In 1916, prominent Charleston merchant and civic leader Clarence W. Legerton commissioned large numbers of baskets to sell wholesale through his Seagrass Basket Company and retail in his King Street bookstore. Legerton's popularization of the baskets helped increase production through the 1920s (Rosengarten 1987). As the commercial popularity of the baskets increased, weavers sought a direct market with the consumer, and set up simple wood stands along the sides of U.S. 17 in the early 1930s (Richey and Young 2009).

The Sea Islands provided a place for recreation and an escape from the summer heat for those who had the means and time to travel to the coast. Better automobile-oriented infrastructure made it easier to spend a day at the beach or take a vacation to the coast. Doctor Joseph Lawrence developed Isle of Palms as a beach resort at the turn of the twentieth century. He constructed a trolley rail line between Mount Pleasant and Sullivan's Island and across Sullivan's Island to Isle of Palms. Dr. Lawrence also constructed a dance pavilion, although it was destroyed by fire in the 1920s, and carnivals and festivals were often held on the island (Clarke 1998). A hotel, bathhouse, and modest residential development soon followed. The construction of highway bridges over Cove and Breach inlets made automobile and bus access to Sullivan's Island and Isle of Palms available and sparked further development. New roads and streets were laid out and large numbers of homes were constructed (Clarke 1998). Similar development was occurring on Edisto Island. In 1925, six businessmen from Sumter, South Carolina formed the Edisto Beach Company and purchased McConkey's Island, now named Edisto Island, for $60,000 (Spencer 2008). Due to dwindling funds and a vital need for an improved main road down the front beach, the Edisto Beach Company reached an agreement with the state that the company would donate the entire north end of the beach for a state park and in return, the state would pave and maintain Palmetto Boulevard and the public road that leads to the main land (Spencer 2008). Edisto Beach State Park was established in 1935, and the paving project was completed in 1937. Today, Edisto Beach and Edisto Beach State Park are located in Colleton County. Isle of Palms and Edisto Beach provided summer homes for those visiting from afar or could afford a modest second home. For residents or visitors of Charleston, Folly Beach has been used as the local beach since the late 1910s.

The early twentieth century was the beginning of many changes in Charleston County, moving farther away from their antebellum life ways and beginning to embrace the industrial nature of the New South. Amidst all changes – new industries, new roads, new technologies – the residents of Charleston County retained the culture of the Lowcountry.

WORLD WAR II AND POST-WAR ERA – 1940-1960

World War II and the subsequent economic, population, and development booms that followed the war dominate the mid-twentieth century. Charleston County was very active during the war with the presence of both the Navy and the Army. The naval yard greatly expanded its facilities and missions, which included the construction of new ships and the repair and overhaul of damaged ships (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). The yard also was given the mission to provide supplies for ships, both those being built and those being overhauled (Figure 11a). Through the course of the war, the Charleston Naval Yard constructed 216 new ships (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). The naval yard grew quickly and dramatically in order to handle its many missions. The facilities expanded in order to accommodate its mission, including new shipways, piers, shop buildings, and a new shipyard to the south of the original yard to provide space to construct destroyer escort ships. Employment increased more than tenfold, from approximately 2,400 employees in 1939 to almost 26,000 in 1943 (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995).

Just prior to the attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941, the United States Army Air Force began using the Charleston Municipal Airport as a training base for the B-24 “Liberator” bomber (Edgar 2006). After officially leasing the airport from the City of Charleston in 1942, the base was then reassigned to the Air Transport Command (ATC) for the purpose of training crews for transport aircrafts (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). The Army also upgraded the garrison and increased the battery at Fort Moultrie on Sullivan’s Island in an effort to improve the country’s seacoast defense. Fort Moultrie was used as an Army-Navy command post to provide a single location to direct the artillery defending the harbor and control the shipping (Edgar 2006). The Army also trained soldiers to operate and repair DUKWs, amphibious vehicles, at the fort. The amphibious trucks were used by the military to move cargo from ships at anchor to the beaches in both theaters, and the beaches at Isle of Palms and Sullivan's Island were ideal to practice landing the vehicles (Figure 11b) (Clarke 1998). After the German military used U-boats to place mines in Charleston Harbor, the soldiers stationed at Fort Moultrie regularly patrolled the islands at night. Additionally, multiple prisoner-of-war camps were established in Charleston County. The five camps were located at the Charleston Port of Embarkation (Fort Moultrie), the Charleston Army Air Base, the Charleston Naval Yard, the Charleston General Hospital, and in West Ashley near the Ashley River. The location of the prisoners of war camp in West Ashley was marked by a fireplace and chimneystack built by German prisoners of war until it was demolished in November 2015.

The sudden rise in employment at the naval yard and the creation of an air base within close proximity during World War II caused a housing shortage in Charleston County. To address the housing needs of the military personnel and civilian war workers, the Housing Authority of the City of Charleston, in conjunction with federal housing programs, constructed five housing projects – George S. Legare Homes, Ben Tillman Homes, Tom McMillian Homes, Liberty Homes, and Liberty Homes extension – in North Charleston, close to the naval yard (Preservation Consultants, Inc. 1995). By the end of 1943, the Housing Authority of the City of Charleston owned or operated a total of 7,214 units. The government-built units were supplemented by private-sector development of neighborhoods made up of single-family, detached houses. The first of these private endeavors was Nafair, built in 1940, followed by Dorchester Terrace, Waylyn, and Whipper Barony (Preservation Consultants, Inc. 1995). Similar housing was constructed in West Ashley. Byrnes Downs was developed by the Victory Housing Corporation, a private developer, in 1945 to provide rental housing for naval yard workers. The subdivision was completed a month before the end of World War II and the houses were eventually sold to returning soldiers and their families (Robert and Company 2009b). The houses in these developments were typically of the Minimal Traditional type, which is modest in size and fenestration.

At the conclusion of World War II, the Navy rapidly demobilized. The naval yard was still busy as 69,000 ships were scheduled for deactivation and thousands of tons of surplus materials for disposal (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). During the demobilization efforts, the Navy reorganized, during which all the various naval functions located in Charleston were incorporated into a single base, the U.S. Naval Base, Charleston. The naval yard was renamed the Charleston Naval Shipyard and retained the shipyard itself along with the naval hospital, marine barracks, receiving station, training station, radio station. The U.S. Naval Ammunition Depot in Berkeley County and a small minecraft base on the Ashley River were also included in the base (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). The shipyard became a surface ship repair and overhaul yard until it received its new mission as a submarine overhaul yard in 1948 (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). Submarines were the reason for continued growth and development at the naval base during the Cold War era because they were the most advanced and technically sophisticated of the Navy's vessels, requiring specialized land base support facilities (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). This mission brought repair and overhaul work, as well as supply and weapons work, to the naval base.

During the first half of the 1950s, new technologies for submarines were developed, namely nuclear propulsion and guided missile systems. Upon incorporating these new technologies into their fleet, in 1956, the Navy decided, considering it was already a submarine repair and overhaul yard, the Charleston shipyard would become a nuclear yard. The shipyard would become capable of repair and overhaul work on the Navy's nuclear-powered submarine fleet and nuclear-powered surface ships (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). With the designation of the shipyard as a nuclear submarine repair and overhaul facility, the Navy selected Charleston as the site for the Navy's first ballistic missile system assembly facility, the Polaris Missile Facility, Atlantic. The Polaris facility would be located at the U.S. Naval Ammunition Depot in Berkeley County and expand to over 13,500 acres, marking the last period of significant expansion and development at the naval base (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995).

The Army also demobilized following the conclusion of World War II. Fort Moultrie was deactivated in 1947, and its buildings were sold to private individuals or given to the State of South Carolina (Edgar 2006). In 1960, the fort was transferred from the state to the National Park Service to be incorporated into Fort Sumter National Monument. The Charleston Air Base was deactivated and, in 1946, was declared surplus by the War Department and transferred to the War Assets Administration for disposal (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). The City of Charleston soon began negotiations with the War Assets Administration to regain their municipal airport, acquiring the majority of the air field facilities, including hangars and runways, and signing leases with national airlines (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). At the same time, tensions between the Soviet Union and the United States were rising. The United States Congress reacted by increasing defense spending. In May 1951, Congress approved a new defense budget, which included monies for the Charleston airfield to be reactivated and converted into a Tactical Air Command (TAC) troop carrier base. The plan called for the construction of facilities and runways to house 6,000 personnel and to accommodate 100 military aircraft (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). Due to the city's ownership of much of the property and the United States' involvement in the conflict in Korea, an agreement was quickly reached between the City of Charleston and the Air Force to jointly use the facility (Figure 12); the Air Force would maintain the field and had use of the portion of the property south and west of the railroad tracks, while the city retained the municipal terminal and several hangars and buildings on the northeast end of the property (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995).

Charleston County's economy remained strong and diverse after World War II. The majority of the county's industries were located within the city limits of Charleston and, according to the 1957 Industrial Directory of South Carolina, were small in scale, typically listed as employing 200 individuals or less (South Carolina State Development Board 1957). These smaller industries manufactured a wide variety of products, for example foodstuffs, such as bakery products, roasted coffee, and ice cream; wood products, such as furniture and dressed lumber; metal products, such as sheet metal and aluminum products; as well as fertilizers, printed products, and processed Spanish moss (South Carolina State Development Board 1957). The largest industries in the county included the American Tobacco Company (1,300-1,325 employees), the West Virginia Pulp and Paper Company (950-1,000 employees), General Asbestos and Rubber Company (600-630 employees), and the Manhattan Shirt Company (500-525 employees) (South Carolina State Development Board 1957).

Elsewhere in the county, other small-scale industries persisted. Oyster, fish, and seafood industries continued to operate in Awendaw, Edisto Island, Yonges Island, and Mount Pleasant. Mount Pleasant was also the home to the Shem Creek Cabinet Works and the Mount Pleasant Boat Building Company, while steel and iron fabrication works were established on Folly Beach and in the towns of Myers and Hollywood (South Carolina State Development Board 1957). James Island had a turkey farm that processed turkeys, and Johns Island was home to the Charleston Brick Company. None of these industries employed more than 50 people, and the majority listed as employing 25 people or less (South Carolina State Development Board 1957).

The renewal in Charleston County's industrial economy was due to the revival of the Port of Charleston. In 1942, the South Carolina General Assembly created the South Carolina State Ports Authority (SPA), which subsequently mandated the development of the ports in Charleston, Georgetown, and Port Royal (Tibbetts 2008). The SPA received surplus property from the Federal Government after the war: the Port of Embarkation north of Charleston and the docks in downtown Charleston. These resources were repaired and upgraded, modern equipment was installed, and new sales offices were established in places like New York in an effort to attract new business (Tibbetts 2008). SPA's efforts were met with initial success. In 1945, 243 American ships and 126 international steamers called at the Port of Charleston (City of Charleston 1945). Five years later, the number had almost doubled, with 451 American ships and 287 international ships calling at the port and a net registered tonnage of 3,129,766 passing through it (City of Charleston 1950). The improved port benefitted not just Charleston and Charleston County, but the State of South Carolina as a whole (Figure 13).

Charleston County's continued transition to a modern industrial and tourism-based economy began to come at the expense of its agricultural past by the mid-twentieth century. A snapshot of farm data in 1940 indicated the same framework of agricultural land distribution and farm labor practices that had been established in Charleston County during the Reconstruction Era of the late nineteenth century remained relatively fixed up to World War II. At the start of the twentieth century, 42.8 percent of Charleston County's African American population owned land. This number far eclipsed the 22.4 percent of African Americans who owned land in other parts of the state (Graves 2010:46). Furthermore, most owned farms appeared to still be the small agricultural parcels purchased by black freedmen in the years following emancipation. As late as 1950, 78 percent (n=1,174 of 1,505) of farms owned in Charleston County were less than 50 acres in size (South Carolina Crop Reporting Service 1965:4).

Save for a steep plummet at the start of the Great Depression in 1929, the number of farms in the county held relatively constant before World War II with 3,801 farms recorded in 1899 and 3,733 in 1934. On the eve of the war, almost 80 percent (n=1,684) of the county's 2,124-recorded farms were fully or partly-owned, while tenant farming still accounted for 20 percent (n=419) of the operational farms. Furthermore, 83 percent (n=1,767) of the farms were less than 50 acres in size. The number of farms would drop precipitously in the years immediately following war. Between 1939 and 1949, the number of farm properties in Charleston County fell from 2,124 farms, totaling 166,491 acres of land, to 1,505 farms with 139,139 acres. By 1959, only 641 farms remained. Ten years later, the number of farms had fallen to 235 (70,500 acres of farmland) as woods and farmlands increasingly gave way to golf courses, residential subdivisions, and coastal development (Berkeley-Charleston-Dorchester Regional Planning Council and Charleston County Planning Board 1975; South Carolina Crop Reporting Service 1965:4)

Despite emerging from the war with a strong economy, improved infrastructure, and continued residential development, Charleston County still fell short when it came to racial equality. African Americans began leaving Charleston County—and South Carolina and the South in general—to large northern cities such as Detroit, New York City, and Chicago in an attempt to escape the Jim Crow laws that were enacted across the South in the 1920s and to seek out better employment opportunities (Edgar 1998). This exodus of African Americans, referred to as the Great Migration, occurred again after World War II, as black soldiers sought the same liberties they had risked their lives to defend for others. The Great Migration changed the population dynamics in Charleston County. In 1930, 46,198 white residents lived in Charleston County and 54,812 black residents, making up approximately 46 percent and 54 percent of the county's population, respectively (University of Virginia, Geospatial and Statistical Data Center 2014). The percentage of the African American population in the county had been slowly declining since the turn of the twentieth century, when African Americans comprised approximately 68 percent of the county's population (University of Virginia, Geospatial and Statistical Data Center 2014). In 1940, the African American population was less than the white population, 49-50 percent, for the first time in the last 110 years (University of Virginia, Geospatial and Statistical Data Center 2014). By 1950, African Americans accounted for 41 percent of the population and, by 1960, only 36 percent (University of Virginia, Geospatial and Statistical Data Center 2014).

African Americans who opted to remain in Charleston County contended with segregation and institutional racism. Even access to beaches and other recreation areas was not open to all citizens of Charleston County equally. Since they were prohibited from swimming at white-designated beaches such as Folly and Edisto by Jim Crow segregation laws, Charleston County's African American residents flocked to the various beach areas and recreation sites owned and operated by local black business owners. Beginning in the 1930s, five "black beaches" opened throughout the county: Riverside Beach Park in Mount Pleasant; Frasier Beach (now Rural Mission); Peter Miller Pavilion; Edisto Beach (now Seaside Beach on Edisto Beach); and Mosquito Beach near the Sol Legare Community (Knapp 2014). Although typically located near riversides and sounds (compared to the white-only beachfront areas along the coast), these beaches provided African Americans bathers a place to cool off from the oppressive summer heat. In addition to the beach areas themselves, these sites also boasted hotels, motels, restaurants, stores, and other attractions that catered to local African American residents, vacationing tourists, and business travelers alike from the 1940s through the 1960s.

The county's golf courses were also segregated. African Americans interested in the game of golf could only participate by caddying for white, male players; there were no golf courses for blacks or that allowed blacks to play on their greens. Richard Smalls, Sr., who lived in the Grimball Farms community, had worked as a caddy at the Country Club of Charleston golf course for many years and decided to use his knowledge of golf to remedy the situation (Frazier 2007). After studying golf course construction and design, Smalls purchased eight acres of land in the Grimball Farms community and a small tractor. With help from several men in the community, Smalls constructed a six-hole golf course, complete with a club house, bar, and eight-room motel, which was located along Grimball Farms Road at the junction of Little Rock Boulevard (Frazier 2007). The course, dubbed the Little Rock Golf Club, was completed in 1953 and played until the City of Charleston Municipal Golf Course was ordered by a federal judge to desegregate in 1961. Today, neither the course nor its buildings are extant.

Many African Americans participated in the growing activism across the state, hoping to invoke change. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) was active in South Carolina in the 1920s, with the Charleston chapter successfully campaigning to replace white teachers and principals in black schools with black teachers and principals (Edgar 1998). In 1944, the NAACP successfully challenged the South Carolina law that only whites could vote in primary elections, which resulted in the state Democratic party requiring even more extensive literacy tests in order to participate in primary elections (Edgar 2006). The black civil rights movement gained momentum after World War II, challenging voter restrictions, unequal education budgets, segregated public transportation, and segregation in higher education.

Septima Poinsette Clark, one of South Carolina's early civil rights leaders, was an educator from Charleston who was eventually dismissed from the Charleston County School System in 1956 for not renouncing her membership in the NAACP (Figure 14a). After losing her job, Clark traveled to Tennessee to work at the Highlander Folk School. There, she taught students and visitors from around the South – both white and black – to read by reciting the United States Constitution (Spinnenweber and Heywood 2013). Clark's work at the Highlander Folk School led to the creation and establishment of citizenship schools in South Carolina.

Clark worked with Bernice Robinson and Esau Jenkins (Figure 14b) to develop the concept and curriculum for the citizenship schools. In 1957, the three, with assistance from the Highlander School, opened a citizenship school in the Progressive Club building on Johns Island (Figure 14c). The school specialized in South Carolina election laws and voting, as well as teaching reading, writing, and arithmetic so African Americans could pass the required literacy tests to vote (Laurens and Scott 2007). The school's popularity prompted Clark and Jenkins to train new citizenship school teachers and develop classes on nearby Wadmalaw and Edisto islands. Soon classes were also established in the North Charleston area, Saint Helena Island, and Dafuskie Island (Laurens and Scott 2007). The schools' success is evident in the approximately 600 African Americans that were able to register to vote in Charleston County by 1960 (Spinnenweber and Heywood 2013). Thirty-seven more citizenship schools opened on the Sea Islands, mainland Charleston County, and neighboring counties by 1961, helping African Americans register to vote and discover new local community leaders.

In 1950, James Byrnes, one of South Carolina's most prominent politicians, announced his candidacy for governor of South Carolina. Byrnes' platform was based on improving education in South Carolina, a popular political issue at the time. This was due to two recent events. First, the state received a poor review from the National Peabody Commission, whose 1948 report recommended that the state equalize its school finance programs, consolidate its 1,700 school districts, close deteriorated schools, and undertake a major new school building program (Bartels 2004). Secondly, two lawsuits concerning segregation in higher education were brought to the Supreme Court: Sweatt v. Painter, originating in Texas, and McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents for Higher Education. The Supreme Court agreed that the practices of segregation in higher education did not provide blacks with educational and professional opportunities afforded to whites and ordered the desegregation of state universities (Dobrasko 2005:7). Aware that the NAACP may file lawsuits against public school districts in order to desegregate the schools, Byrnes and other state politicians hoped that desegregation could be avoided if the public schools truly met the “separate but equal” standard established by Plessy v. Ferguson (Bartels 2004). Byrnes easily won the election and immediately implemented his education improvement plan, which was formed from the 1948 Peabody Commission recommendations and a 1950 report by the House of Representatives supporting a sales tax to fund education (Bartels 2004). Upon discovering news that a desegregation case in Clarendon County, South Carolina was filed in the federal district court in Charleston, white politicians quickly implemented Byrnes’ education plan.

In order to receive the state equalization funds, Charleston County was required to first determine its equalization priorities and then consolidate schools and school districts, both white and black. As a result of the initial studies, it was recommended to consolidate Charleston County’s original 23 districts into nine and to eliminate virtually all the one- and two-teacher school houses (Dobrasko 2005). This plan was approved by the state in February 1952, allowing the county to submit architectural drawings and site plans to the Educational Finance Commission as a formal request for funding to construct the top school equalization priorities in the district (Dobrasko 2005).

The locations of the new schools reflected the shifts in Charleston County’s population during the late 1940s into the early 1950s. Many white residents were leaving the City of Charleston and moving to the surrounding suburbs of West Ashley and Mount Pleasant. African American residents were concentrated in the North Charleston area, taking advantage of employment opportunities at the Naval Base, Charleston Air Force Base, and Naval Weapons Station after the United States military installations desegregated in 1948. The county’s rural areas were also predominantly African American. Opposition in predominantly white school districts to the school equalization program caused reluctance amongst local school officials to implement the program. The City of Charleston’s District 20 school board even went so far as to propose an equal distribution of funds between the white and black schools in the city (Dobrasko 2005). Their plan was met with anger from the city’s black organizations, the NAACP, and the parents of the African American students, as the school district was already spending $435 for every white student and only $206 per black student (Dobrasko 2005). Amidst petitions and protests, the District 20 school board quietly dropped their plan.

Charleston County received over six million dollars for school equalization by 1953 and put four million dollars into the construction and renovation of African American schools throughout the county. By 1955, Charleston County had spent the majority of its funding: 25 new schools were constructed (Table 1) and 20 existing schools received monies for renovations and/or additions to upgrade buildings (Dobrasko 2005). The new schools were modernist in style and design, taking into account recent requirements for proper lighting, ventilation, and circulation through the building. The funds were also spent on equipment and, in rural areas, bus systems. However, continued white resistance attempted to ensure that true equalization would never occur, as the black schools in Charleston County often lacked the amenities provided at white schools, such as libraries, auditoriums, and athletic fields. And while the school facilities – black and white – were upgraded and met modern standards, the education offered in the schools did not.

The expenditure of millions of dollars to equalize schools throughout the South did not prevent the Supreme Court decision in Brown v. Board of Education that overturned Plessy v. Ferguson and ended desegregation in the United States. Although the ruling was handed down in 1954, it would be almost another 10 years before the schools in Charleston County were truly integrated.

MID-TWENTIETH CENTURY – 1960-1975

As the 1960s began, the fight for Civil Rights continued. Despite the Supreme Court ruling against the practice of desegregation, white leaders and citizenry throughout the South continued to deny African Americans equality and their civil rights. Boycotts, petitions, and protests – both peaceful and violent – continued, and progress occurred slowly. In 1963, both Clemson University and the University of South Carolina integrated (Edgar 1998). Also in 1963, under a court order, 11 African American students entered previously all-white schools in Charleston County’s District 20, becoming the first school district in the state to desegregate (Dobrasko 2005).

The Civil Rights movement focused on voting rights next, as hallmarks of the Jim Crow age, literacy tests, oaths, and poll taxes prevented many blacks in South Carolina from voting. The votes of African Americans who were able to cast them often went uncounted by white poll officials (Edgar 2006). The Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as well as the enforcement of the one-person, one-vote rule in redistricting, dramatically changed the face of the civil rights movement in South Carolina (Edgar 2006). The Civil Rights Act forced industries, such as the textile industry, to hire black workers and the Voting Rights Act eliminated literacy tests, allowing African Americans to register to vote in record numbers. By 1967, over 50 percent of South Carolina’s eligible black voters were registered (Edgar 2006). By 1968, African American representation at the state convention was almost proportional to their numbers in the total population (Edgar 1998).

One of the larger civil rights protests in Charleston County was the Charleston Hospital Strike in 1969. The strike united African American medical workers in their demands for equal treatment, equal pay, and the right to unionize, as well as the inclusion of greater numbers of African American nursing and medical students and physicians at the Medical College Hospital (MCH) and Charleston County Hospital (CCH), both located in Charleston (Taylor 2013). However, as the events unfolded, broader issues of race, gender, and class emerged. The account began two years prior, when a white head nurse withheld patient files from five African American nursing assistants. The nurses argued that it was customary for them to have access to the files and they could not properly do their jobs without them. They walked out in protest and were summarily fired for insubordination (Edgar 2006). The five women decided to ask Mary Moultrie for assistance to get their jobs back. Moultrie, a nurse's aide who had worked in a unionized hospital in New York City, discussed the situation with William Saunders, a factory worker, activist, and community liaison with the local office of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (HEW), and Isaiah Bennett, a union organizer (Edgar 2006). Small groups of MCH workers met weekly in semi-secrecy, fearing reprisal, while HEW investigated the firings. Although the five women were reinstated, the meetings continued and the numbers in attendance grew. African American workers from CCH, led by Rosetta Simmons, began joining the meetings. At the meetings, black hospital workers continued to raise similar complaints about their treatment, including unusually heavy workloads, the use of racial slurs by white hospital staff, and unequal pay that was below the federal minimum wage (Taylor 2013).

With their grievances unanswered by MCH administrators, Moultrie, Saunders, and Bennett contacted the Local 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale, and Department Store Workers, which had organized hospital unions in New York City, to discuss organizing a healthcare union in Charleston (Edgar 2006). Looking to expand their reach, Local 1199 agreed, dispatched a full-time organizer to Charleston in November of 1968, and chartered Local 1199B, which voted Mary Moultrie as their president (Taylor 2013).

On March 17, 1969, a 12-person delegation from MCH, led by Moultrie, met with MCH president William McCord to request formal recognition of the union and discuss their grievances. The meeting and subsequent occupation of McCord's office failed, and the 12 union members were fired, including Moultrie (Taylor 2013). That evening, Local 1199B voted to go on strike, demanding recognition of the union, a meaningful grievance procedure, a 30-cent increase in MCH's minimum hourly wage to the federal standard of $1.60, and the rehiring of the 12 fired employees (Edgar 2006).

Picket lines formed at MCH on March 20, 1969. Nine days later, approximately 60 employees from CCH joined the strike. McCord and Governor Robert McNair, ardent anti-unionists, secured an injunction that prohibited picketing, limiting the lines to only 10 picketers at a 20-yard distance from each other (Taylor 2013). On March 31, Dr. Ralph David Abernathy of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) arrived in Charleston and spoke to about 1,500 strikers and their supporters (Figure 15a) (Edgar 2006). The support of the prominent organization helped by overcoming divisions within local black leadership, rallying Charleston's black community to support the strike, and lending the strike legitimacy on the national stage.

The strike soon devolved from peaceful protests to violence, arrests, National Guard patrols, and citywide curfews. After the arrest of Abernathy and 101 demonstrators at the end of April, Coretta Scott King traveled to Charleston to speak to the protestors and lead a march to the hospital complex (Figure 15b) (Edgar 2006). As the strike and protests continued on through May and into June, Charleston's economy suffered from the SCLC's boycott of city businesses, lost tourist and convention revenues, as well as threats from the predominantly-black International Longshoremen Association to close the Port of Charleston. Additionally, federal officials were threatening to pull funding from MCH if a settlement was not reached.

Amidst mounting political, social, and financial pressures, McCord finally announced a strike settlement on June 27, 1969, approximately 100 days after the strike began. McCord and MCH agreed "to rehire the strikers within the week, to abide by a newly established six-step grievance process, and to provide modest pay increases (Taylor 2013)." The strike at CCH continued for another three weeks before reaching a similar agreement. Although they were not able to receive union recognition, it was still considered a victory for hospital workers, both black and white, across the state.

Although the 1960s brought dramatic, yet overdue, social change to Charleston County, its overall economy remained steady throughout the decade. The Air Force and Navy maintained their presence in the county. The Charleston Air Force Base was reorganized after 1966 to Military Airlift Command (MAC). This change required the base to house and fly C-5 "Galaxy" transport planes, which required larger facilities due to their extremely large size (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). The base's extensive renovation and expansion was completed in 1970; however, the C-5 was only housed there for three years (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995).

The naval base continued to prepare for its mission as a nuclear submarine surface ships repair and overhaul base into the 1960s and the 1970s. In the early 1960s, the shipyard constructed new dry docks to better accommodate the new submarines and larger ships it would service. The shipyard also went through a necessary reorganization in the late 1960s and early 1970s, as a result of the impending nuclear submarine work (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). Although meant to strengthen the base as it began nuclear work in earnest, the shipyard instead declined in quality. In 1973, the shipyard fell behind schedule on three nuclear submarine overhauls, causing Admiral Hyman G. Rickover to declare the Charleston shipyard "the worst in the nation" (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). The shipyard took a 10-year hiatus from nuclear submarine overhauls and spent time improving its scheduling procedures, only to make a triumphant return in 1984 when it received the Chief of Naval Material Productivity Excellence Award (University of South Carolina Legacy Project 1995). For the next 10 years, the shipyard was a consistent leader in productivity amongst both the Navy and private shipyards. The span of the Cold War kept the Charleston Naval Base open and spurred its expansion in the late twentieth century, and the end of the Cold War brought the closure of the base. In 1995, the Polaris Missile Facility, Atlantic closed, and a year later, the naval base closed.

The majority of the county's industry remained within the city limits of Charleston; however, the number of manufacturers slowly declined. The 1957 Industrial Directory of South Carolina lists upwards of 200 manufacturers within the city of Charleston alone (South Carolina State Development Board 1957). By 1965, there were 134 manufacturers in Charleston; in 1970, there were 124; and by 1975, the number had dropped to under 100 (South Carolina State Development Board 1965; 1970; 1975). The closure of Charleston's smaller industries caused the declining numbers of industry within the city. The larger industries remained and, by 1975, the largest employers in the county included the General Electric Company (1,100 employees), Westvaco Corporation, formerly the West Virginia Pulp and Paper Company (1,650 employees), and Raybestos Manhattan Industrial Products, formerly General Asbestos and Rubber Company (969 employees) (South Carolina State Development Board 1975).

Small-scale industries slightly increased in number outside of the Charleston city limits, punctuated with a notable, yet temporary, increase in the oyster, shrimp, and crab processing industries. While the Flowers Oyster Company and Yonges Island Canning Company on Edisto and Yonges islands, respectively, continued to operate into the late 1960s, new seafood processing companies emerged. Multiple companies were operating in Mount Pleasant and Wadmalaw, as well as McClellanville, which had six companies that processed and canned shrimp, oysters, and/or crabmeat (South Carolina State Development Board 1965). Only four of the 16 seafood companies operating in 1965 remained open by 1975. Other prominent manufacturers listed in the 1975 directory included: the Shem Creek Cabinet Works, the Mount Pleasant Boat Building, and the Detyens Shipyard in Mount Pleasant; Kerr-McGee Chemical Corporation in Jericho; L & B Merchants, specializing in prepared meats, and Sandblasters ship repair on Johns Island; and Toogoodoo Farms on Yonges Island (South Carolina State Development Board 1975).

Through the 1960s, vegetable farming continued to be a mainstay of Charleston County's agricultural economy. Despite the majority of the farms in the county comprising less than 50 acres, Charleston County led the state in 1963 in farm cash receipts from vegetables and was second statewide in feed crops, which included peanuts, seed crops, fruits, and nuts (South Carolina Crop Reporting Service 1965). As shown in Figure 16, almost 70 percent of the county's agricultural value was from vegetables, with soybeans, egg production, livestock, timber, and other crops making up the other 33 percent. Charleston County also ranked seventh in the state in timber production in 1963 (South Carolina Crop Reporting Service 1965). In 1963, the Lipton Tea Company purchased the old Whaley Plantation on Wadmalaw to grow tea using tea plants from Pinehurst, a former tea plantation in Charleston County that dates to the turn of the twentieth century (Jordan and Stringfellow 1998). Although the tea plantation would eventually become a notable part of Charleston County's economy, vegetables, including soybeans and corn, and timber continued to be the county's principal crops well into the 1970s.

The county's residential and resort development continued to grow in conjunction with improvements to the area's roads. In 1964, Interstate 26 reached North Charleston, creating a direct route to Columbia, South Carolina; Asheville, North Carolina; and Kingsport, Tennessee (Moore 1987). The construction of the final section of the interstate from Aviation Avenue to its terminus at U.S. 17 took five years due to negotiating land takings and the construction of numerous bridges and viaducts (Federal Highway Administration 2015). With the completion of Interstate 26, reaching the coast became more efficient. Manufacturers in the upstate could reach the Port of Charleston more quickly. Tourists and travelers could access the coast more easily. For locals, Interstate 26 became a primary corridor for commuters traveling between their jobs in the city and their homes in the northern suburbs, spurring more residential growth in North Charleston and Berkeley County.

The construction of transportation facilities across the Ashley and Cooper rivers continued to influence development east and west of the peninsula. Starting in the mid-1950s, sections of U.S. 17 in Charleston County were widened to four lanes, with the entire route through the county widened to four lanes by the early 1980s. This allowed more traffic and encouraging roadside commercial development over residential development. A second bridge over the Ashley River was constructed in 1961 to carry U.S. 17's northbound traffic over the river, with the Ashley River Memorial Bridge carrying the southbound traffic. These transportation improvements made it easier for white, middle class residents to continue to leave the city, creating a greater demand for suburban housing in West Ashley and Mount Pleasant, pushing development further east and west. The initial suburban construction in West Ashley spread to James Island and further southwest along U.S. 17, approximately to where it crosses Long Branch Creek, on the west side of the city, while suburban development around Mount Pleasant also spread further northeast along U.S. 17. Suburban-type development also occurred within the county's African American communities, as some families with larger land holdings subdivided larger plots to sell off individually for development. One of the first African American subdivisions on James Island is the Carver Subdivision in the Grimball Community, which was platted in 1956 for residential development. Many of the homes within African Americans communities were constructed by the property owner – often with the help of family members – or by local African American contractors within the community, who built homes as needed instead of speculatively (Figure 17). By 1975, unincorporated Charleston County evolved from fields and farms into large suburban residential areas of Ranch Houses and shopping centers, creating a commuter culture (Berkeley-Charleston-Dorchester Regional Planning Council and Charleston County Planning Board 1975). The “white flight” period left the City of Charleston with a very disparate population, as those residents with the highest incomes in the county and those with the lowest remained on the peninsula (Berkeley-Charleston-Dorchester Council of Governments and Charleston County Council 1977).

The ease of travel that helped create Charleston's suburbs and commuter culture also drove the development of its Sea Island beach resorts. Infrastructure improvements on the islands spurred more development, which drew more residents and more vacationers to places like Edisto Island and Isle of Palms. By the early 1970s, the value of beachfront property skyrocketed, prompting many individuals who owned entire islands to sell all or part of their land to private development companies. Ground-breaking took place on the Oristo resort on Edisto Island in 1969 (Spencer 2008). In 1972, J.C. Long, who had purchased the Isle of Palms in 1944, sold the undeveloped northern end of the island to a resort development firm (Clarke 1998). In 1974, the Royal family, who bought the island in 1950, sold Kiawah Island to the Kuwaiti-owned Coastal Shores Development Company, which constructed a high-end resort and residences along its beaches (Jordan and Stringfellow 1998). Development on Seabrook Island began slowly in the early 1970s, eventually burgeoning into a residential development for affluent retirees, business executives, and professionals (Jordan and Stringfellow 1998). Improvements in transportation, with the networks of commercial airways and highways, coupled with new wealth and its subsequent new leisure time, made distant vacationing and residential mobility possible. This spurred and sustained Sea Island development (Jordan and Stringfellow 1998). The worth of the county's natural and cultural resources was finally realized and appreciated, by both its citizens and visitors.

The population boom and suburban development that has done much to bolster Charleston County's real estate and tourism industry in the late twentieth century has also exerted considerable economic and cultural pressures on the traditional Gullah communities on the barrier islands and along the coast. With large-scale, suburban and resort development, some places, such as the Scanlonville Community near Mount Pleasant have lost their access to family cemeteries, while other Gullah people on Kiawah and Edisto no longer have access to traditional fishing grounds on these islands. Some longtime landowners in these communities have experienced pressure to sell to developers. Meanwhile, younger members have strongly felt the material draw of modern society and the lure of major cities (Cross 2008:81–83; National Park Service, U.S. Department of the Interior 2005:51; Trinkley and Chicora Foundation Inc. 2001).

Despite the challenges of recent development and changing land uses within Charleston County's historic African American communities, ownership and connections to the land remain a vital component of their Gullah identity. Although no longer used to farm or hunt, landownership remains an expression of independence and survival. According to Dr. Emory

Campbell, the former Executive Director of the Penn Center on St. Helena Island, the “Gullah had an early opportunity to own their own land...it provides a sense of place for holding families together” (Cross 2008:18–19).

The story of Charleston County in the twentieth century is one of change. Over the course of 75 years, the once agrarian county grew into a diversified economy. Formerly segregated, the county made initial strides towards ending inequality. Eventually, the rural county became more connected as the city began to expand beyond the peninsula, and residential and commercial development followed the main thoroughfares away from Charleston in patterns of suburban growth.

V. EVALUATION OF RECORDED PROPERTIES

NATIONAL REGISTER PROPERTIES

Charleston County has a total of 183 individually-listed properties and historic districts on the NRHP, as well as 76 National Historic Landmarks (NHL). Properties listed on the NRHP are deemed worthy of preservation and tell stories that are important on the local, state, or national level, while properties designated as NHLs tell important stories related to the history of the nation overall and must possess a high level of historic integrity. Within the unincorporated areas of the county, there are 59 NRHP-listed properties and districts and five NHLs. For a list of all of Charleston County's NRHP-listed properties, please see Appendix A. A list of NRHP-listed properties within unincorporated Charleston County follows in Table 2.

SURVEYED RESOURCES

The survey covered the majority of unincorporated Charleston County, from the northeast end at the Santee River to Edisto Island on the southern end. The county developed around the City of Charleston and its harbor, which is almost in the geographic center of the county. The county's population density and development radiates outward from the city, following the major roadways of U.S. 17 and Interstate 26. While the central swath of the county is densely developed, residential and commercial developments dissipate as one travels either north or south on U.S. 17. The landscape becomes more rural and features houses on large parcels, farms, and small clusters of homes, often around a church, community center, or community store or gas station. Side roads extending from primary and secondary thoroughfares lead to out-of-the-way residential areas, often down dirt roads. The survey update documented this range – from suburban to rural – of the growth and development that occurred throughout Charleston County in the mid-twentieth century.

The survey recorded 1,319 resources throughout unincorporated Charleston County (Table 3). Eighty-nine percent of the surveyed properties were residential, with commercial properties comprising four percent and religious institutions making up three percent of the total. The remaining four percent includes cemeteries, agricultural properties, entertainment/recreation, civic/social, educational, and government/public buildings. The anticipated high-style modern architecture was an atypical find, as it was located primarily within town or city limits. The buildings recorded during the survey were often vernacular forms, simple in design, and typically constructed from concrete block. Others were stripped down versions of popular building types, such as the Bungalow and the Ranch House. Finding that the majority of unincorporated Charleston County is rural in nature, these building types are indicative of the rural landscape and the residents who live and work there.

Unincorporated Charleston County is also home to a large number of historic African American communities (Figure 18). These close-knit communities are self-sufficient and self-reliant, due to both social traditions and necessity, and have resisted incorporating into municipalities. Although each community has its own story, they share a culture and a history, as well as unique patterns of settlement and development.

CHARLESTON COUNTY'S AFRICAN AMERICAN COMMUNITIES

The history of African American communities in Charleston County extends back to the aftermath of the Civil War as black freedmen and women began forging their own political and economic autonomy. Many Gullah families throughout the Lowcountry maintained strong connections to the land, which they and their enslaved ancestors had lived and worked for generations prior to Emancipation. During the Reconstruction period and the decades that followed, African Americans sought to purchase and farm their own lands to attain a measure of financial self-sufficiency (Brabec and Richardson 2007:153).

Many of these communities lie in unincorporated areas of Charleston County and have experienced considerable changes to their built environments due to demolition, redevelopment, or destruction caused by natural disasters, such as hurricanes and flooding. This has caused the replacement of much of the historic fabric dating from late nineteenth and early twentieth century, including: houses; businesses; churches; institutional buildings (schoolhouses, lodges); agricultural outbuildings; and other structures and objects. While the origins of some of these communities are informal, the linear shape, size, and cadastral patterns of their parcels can often be visually distinctive and in some cases, they may be the most significant character-defining feature of a community district. For those historic African American communities in the county that are no longer extant, the spatial patterning of land parcels may be the only observable indicator of the sites.

Examination of current tax parcel data reveals three identified types of historic property division patterns and development in Charleston County's African American communities. All three types are indicative of the means of land acquisition and settlement by freedmen families in the Reconstruction Era and late nineteenth century. Despite differences in their development histories, the spatial arrangement of the parcels, and varying sizes of their lots, each of the three identified historic African American community types share a few aspects of that are considered "critical elements of Gullah landownership:" the inclusion of traditional burying grounds; traditional community access to nearby waterways and wooded areas for fishing and use of non-timber forest products (e.g. sweetgrass); and a reliance on heirs' property whereby land is conveyed and held "in common" by the descendants of the original deed owner (Brabec and Richardson 2007:159; The Center for Heirs Property 2016).

Remnant Freedmen Communities

The first identified community type appears to be remnants of former slave villages or early freedmen settlements. They may be located on former plantations where African American families accumulated parcels of land over time and a few neighborhoods, such as Grimball Farm community, still retain the names of the parent plantation or plantation owner (Trinkley 1984:11). Although slave ownership of land was not legal in South Carolina, in some rare cases, informal customs in the Lowcountry region did allow for some slaves to accumulate and farm their own land and pass it down to heirs (Brabec and Richardson 2007:153). In other instances, the Federal Government or white planters and their families granted land to freedmen families in the years just after the Civil War. In general, however, most African American landowners were able to purchase property from white planters either individually or in small groups. Many of these holdings may lack formal deeds of conveyance or they have been lost over time, and the land is now owned and transferred as heirs' property (Graves 2010:46–47).

Remnant Freedmen Settlement communities are notable for their distinctive use of long-lot farm parcels. Long-lot farms (also referred to as ribbon farms, and strip farms) are a simple and informal method of land subdivision consisting of long and thin deep lots that maximize frontage to either a road or waterway (or both). Houses tend to be placed at the ends of the lots, nearer to the roads, which promote socialization within the community and reduce the distance required between farmsteads (Barnes 1935:298). The long-lot settlement and farming pattern is common throughout the world and is also found in parts of tropical West Africa, Central Europe, Japan, and South America. Most long-lot surveys in North America are primarily located in French and Spanish-colonized areas of Canada and the United States (Jordon 2005:19).

Examples of long-lot parcel patterning in Charleston County include the Sol Legare, Buck Hall, Tibwin, and South Santee historic African American communities. The patterning is well-preserved in these communities, as visible on tax parcel maps (Figures 19-21). However, modern development and subdividing the long parcels have obscured such patterns, as is the case in the Grimball Farm community (Figure 22). Character-defining features of community development patterns include:

- Long, thin, and deep lots that maximize frontage to the road, waterway, or both modes of transportation. Long-lot parcels are usually 10 times as deep as they are wide;
- Parcel strips are not consistent in size and may range from one to 40 acres. Most lots have often been subdivided for heirs over time. Subdivided farms have either been split in half, segmented along their length or both, contributing to the organic quality to a concentration of these lots;
- Lots may either be landlocked or are adjacent to water. Typically, those communities near water, such as Sol Legare or Tibwin, will contain lots that provide access to both water channels/coastline and an inland roadway;

- Businesses, residences, and institutional buildings are typically clustered near primary roads and have deep setbacks. Buildings with frontage along waterways are uncommon in these communities, save for late twentieth-century tourism and recreational areas such as Mosquito Beach in Sol Legare;
- Some lots may feature one or more dwellings;
- While historic maps and photographs from the early to mid-twentieth century show that most lots were originally cleared for agriculture, most interior lots have become overgrown and reforested in the past few decades; and
- Fence enclosures are rare.

Land Commission Platted Communities

The origin of other historic African American communities in the county are rooted in the large plantation tract sales conducted by the South Carolina Land Commission between 1869 and circa 1890. Established by the reformed-minded, Republican state legislature in 1868, the agency was tasked with the purchasing former plantation tracts from the owners, or their brokers, surveying and subdividing the property, and selling the smaller parcels to both black and white landless farmers and tradesmen. The size of lots ranged from a minimum of 7.5 acres to a maximum of 100 acres. By 1876, an estimated 14,000 African American families throughout South Carolina had purchased and settled on lands sold by the Land Commission (Bleser and South Carolina Tricentennial Commission 1969:xiii–xv, 157-158).

Examination of the 1875 Plat for the Phillips Tract provides an illustration of the standard 10-acre parcel sizes and spatial patterning employed by Commission agents for land subdivisions in the Lowcountry (Bleser and South Carolina Tricentennial Commission 1969:165) (Figure 23a). Surveyed by civil engineer T.A. Huguenin, the plat includes 25 subdivided parallelogram-gridded farm lots ranging in size from just under 10 acres to 25 acres. The majority of parcels are thin rectilinear 10-acre lots fronting a roadway (now part of Canyon Lane) that extends west to the bank of Horlbeck Creek. Larger 15- and 25-acre lots are located along the canal on the western and southwestern corner of the plat. The survey also included “one half of an acre given for a public landing.” Despite subdivision of the original parcels, the survey boundaries in the original 1875 plat are still evident in the current cadastral map of the Phillips Community.

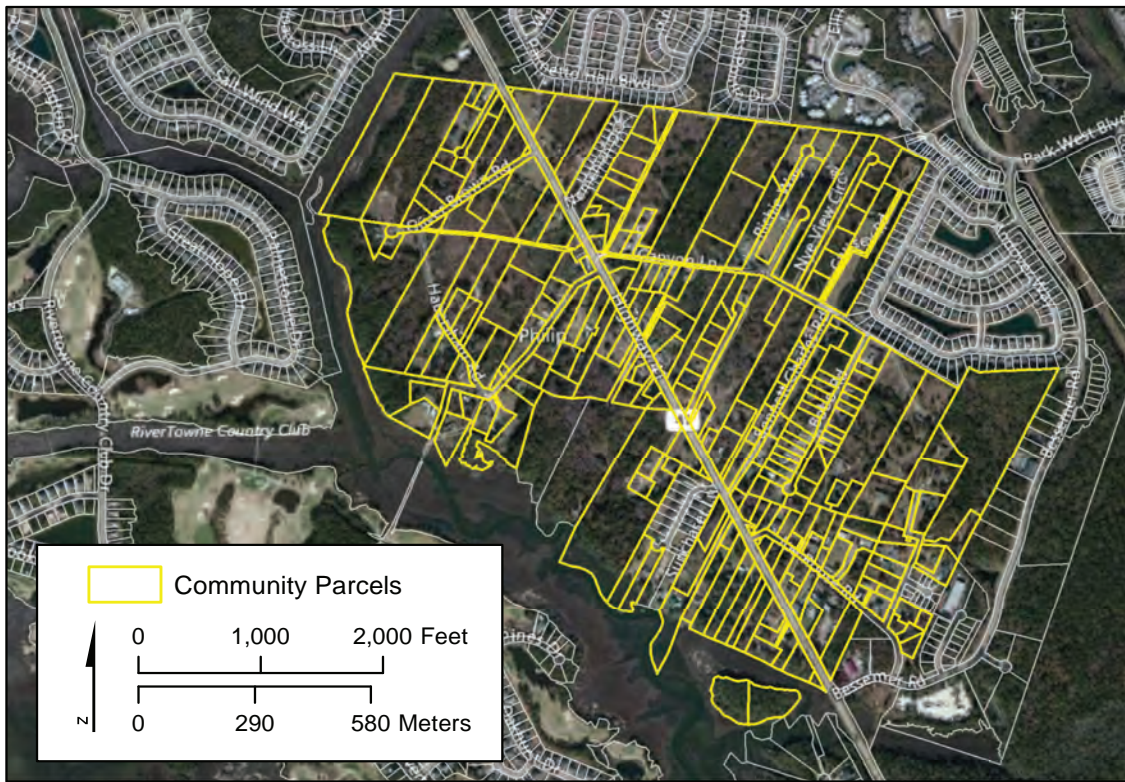

Phillips and Snowden are two examples of the second type of historic African American community planning in Charleston County (Figures 23b and 24). Research of Land Commission records should be conducted at the SCDAH to determine if a community’s original platting exists. Common character-defining features of South Carolina Land Commission platted communities may include:

- Rectilinear, parallelogram-shaped lots (more deep than wide) ranging in size from 7.5-25 acres. Standard Land Commission parcel sizes in Charleston County should be between eight and 10 acres. Larger parcels are typically located at the edges of the community boundaries;
- Lot fronts are primarily oriented to a road; however, some lots may front a waterway or have access to water at the rear or side of the lot;
- Most lots have often been subdivided into smaller, rectangular parcels over time;
- Businesses, residences, and institutional buildings are typically clustered near primary roads and have deep setbacks. Buildings with frontage along waterways are uncommon. Some lots may be vacant;
- Lots may be vacant, contain one dwelling, or multiple dwellings;
- While historic maps and photographs from the early to mid-twentieth century show that most lots were originally cleared and for agriculture, most interior lots have become overgrown and reforested in the past few decades; and
- Fence enclosures are rare.

Planned Land Cooperative Communities

The purchase of former plantation lands by African American freedmen through subscription-based land cooperative ventures was among the most unique methods of land acquisition in South Carolina during Reconstruction. The Scanlonville Community appears to have been one of at least four African American cooperative land purchases in Charleston County (Bleser and South Carolina Tricentennial Commission 1969). The Charleston Land Company, under the direction of namesake John L. Scanlon, purchased 614 acres of the former Remley Point Tract in 1868 for $6,100. The property was surveyed and platted with a grid street plan, and lots were redistributed to company subscribers or sold to prospective buyers. Described by the Charleston News & Courier newspaper as “Colored Communism,” cooperative companies such as the Charleston Land Company also assumed responsibilities within the town that included: presiding over farming issues within the community; dispute settlements between shareholders/subscribers; creation of a mutual benefit fund for sick members; and possible management of the community cemetery and burial of the dead (Trinkley and Chicora Foundation Inc. 2001:9–10).

The 1879 plat, entitled Plan of a Portion of the Tract of Land Known as Remley Point Laid Out in Lots and Now Called Scanlonville, showed only the northern portion of the 614-acre tract to be developed (Figure 25a). The planned community included a series of north-south streets and east-west running avenues laid out in a grid. A total of 394 “town lots” were platted on the west side of the community. Typical town lots measured 100 feet in width and 200 feet in depth. Eighteen lots were contained in street blocks that ran 900 feet east-west by 400 feet north-south

The Scanlonville plat also included 111 vacant lots and 100 linear “farm lots” to the east. In addition, several community or public lots were also designated within the plan. These consisted of a park at the western edge of the development, which included several large trees, a barn, and a house that may have been a remnant of the parent Remley Plantation. A “Grave Yard” was identified on the plat to the southwest of the community near the marsh. It measured 900x200 feet. It appears the original boundaries of the graveyard were expanded over time (Trinkley and Chicora Foundation Inc. 2001:12–13).

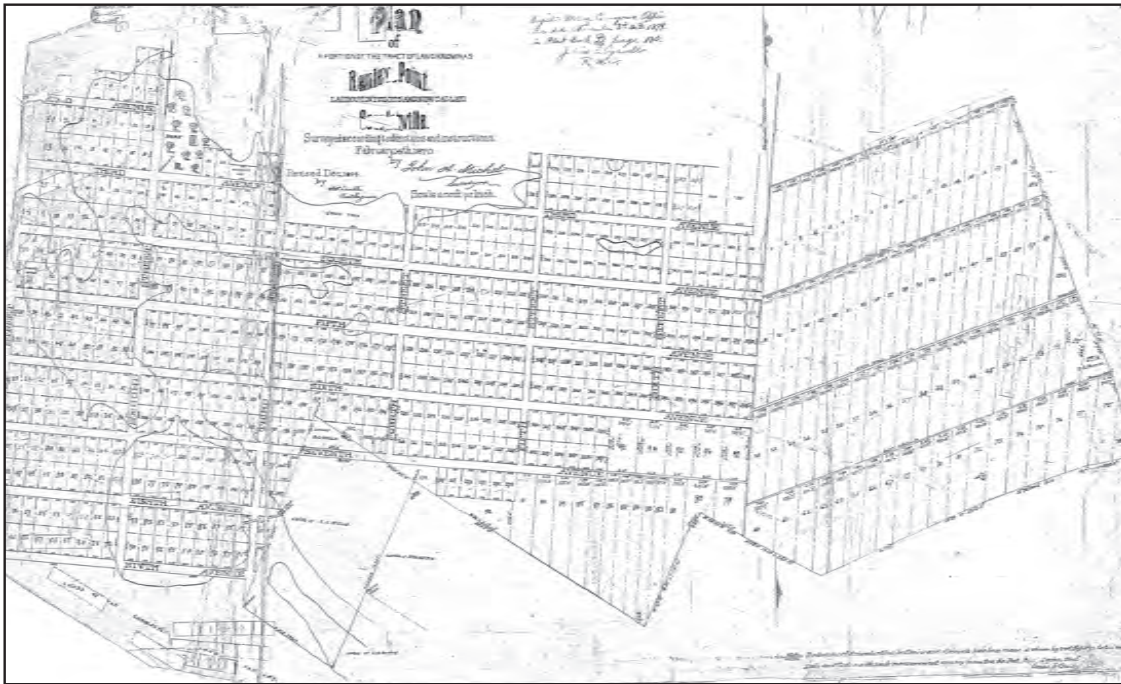

At present, only four cooperative land ventures have been known to exist in Charleston County (the Charleston Land Company, two that operated on Edisto Island, and the failed Atlantic Land Company venture on Bull’s Island). While Scanlonville appears to be the most intact and well-documented planned African American community, there may be others (Figure 25b). Therefore, research of historic plats and deeds may be critical for the identification of additional communities that have been developed as land cooperative ventures. Common character-defining features of historic the Scanlonville and potential other Planned Land Cooperative Communities include:

- Gridded street plans with consistent lot sizes;
- Large, former agricultural lots located at the periphery of the community;
- The presence of publicly-defined community spaces and cemeteries;
- Typically only one residence per lot; and
- Houses are oriented to the main street and have consistent setbacks from the public right-of-way.

Built Environment

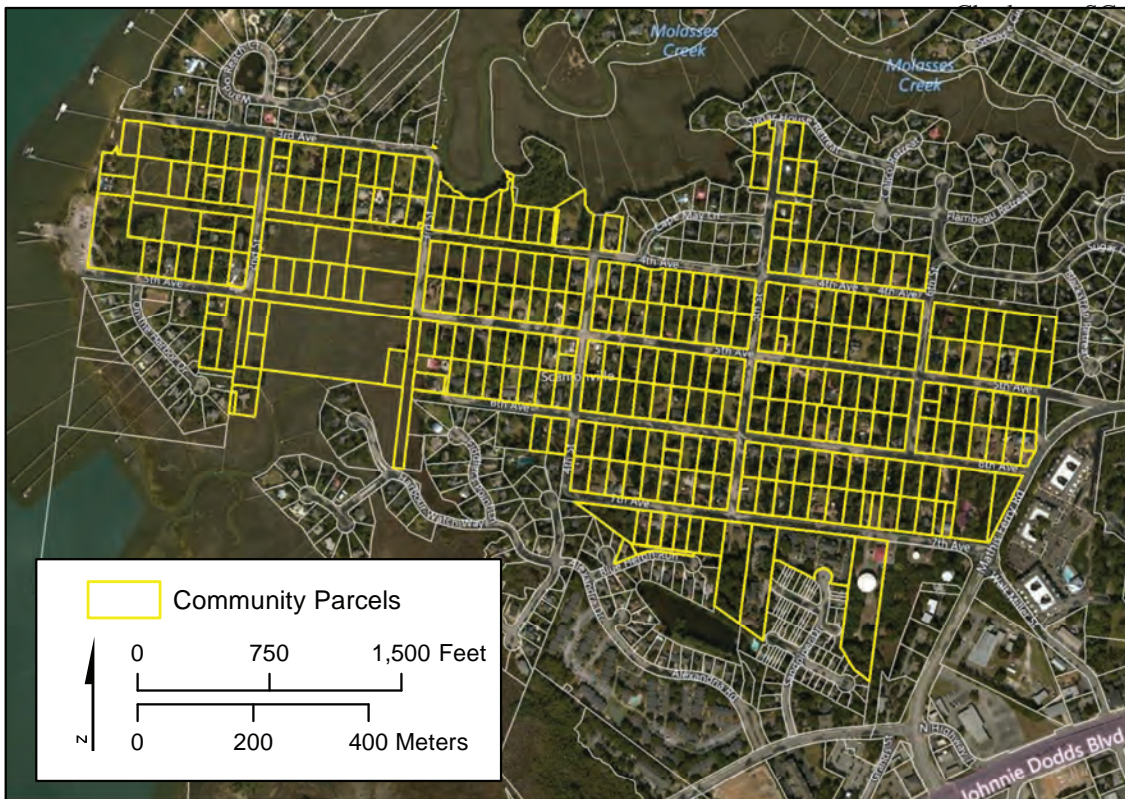

During the survey, buildings were recorded in the communities of South Santee, Buck Hall, Phillips, Red Top, Snowden, Parkers Ferry, and Sol Legare. The majority of the documented properties were residential, but churches, schools, lodges, and community stores were also recorded. The buildings – from houses to churches – were typical of those found throughout the county outside of these communities. Most of the buildings that made up the surveyed African American communities were constructed after 1960. There are very few extant buildings constructed prior to 1950 and almost no extant buildings dating to the early 1900s, with notable exceptions such as the NRHP-listed Seashore Farmers' Lodge in Sol Legare.

Concrete block is the common building material, most likely because it is relatively easy to work with, creates a strong and energy efficient building, and is affordable. Bungalow and Ranch House types are the most common identifiable type; the Ranch House in particular due to its popularity during the mid-twentieth century. Since many homeowners within the historic African American communities built their own dwellings, vernacular forms are also common. These are rectangular in plan with a gable roof and symmetrical façade. Variations in the architectural details of the houses were noted and included tripartite windows flanking the front doors and brick accents around windows and doors (Figures 26-31). In some instances, aluminum or vinyl siding was hung on the exterior of concrete blockhouses, giving them a different look and feel. Mobile homes have been used as in-fill housing as an affordable option for a new home or to replace an older or damaged home. Churches, stores, and lodges are also simply constructed of concrete block with a gable roof and minimal fenestration.

The physical appearance of the buildings is secondary to their location and arrangement within the communities. As discussed, Remnant Freedmen Settlement communities and Land Commission Platted communities are comprised of long, thin lots. The lot shape and size coupled with traditional familial land ties result in the practice of the next generation building their house behind the house of the previous generation. This practice has created a pattern of a row of two, three, or four houses on a family plot of land, one that is very apparent in the Phillips and Sol Legare communities. Short streets, almost as much like a driveway as a street, stretch from the main road into the family parcel, often bearing a family member's name. In other communities, such as Snowden, it appears that family homes are clustered together, having either purchased multiple adjacent lots or subdivided a large lot amongst the family.

Charleston County's African American communities have persisted for close to 150 years. As rapid development continues along the coast, on James Island, and within Mount Pleasant, these communities struggle to retain their land, their culture, and their way of life. These communities are an important part of the history of Charleston County and define the culture and heritage of the Lowcountry.

RESIDENTIAL BUILDINGS

The objective of the survey – to survey unincorporated Charleston County and document properties dating from 1940 to 1975 – coupled with the more rural nature of the county limited the number of different house types documented during fieldwork. Vernacular forms of primarily concrete block construction – and at times wood frame construction – were found in rural areas throughout the county, not just within the African American communities discussed above. Three house types, Bungalows, Minimal Traditional/American Small Houses, and Ranch Houses, were prevalent throughout the county.

Bungalow

The Bungalow House type reached its peak popularity in the southeastern United States between 1900 and 1930, and continued to be constructed through the 1940s and 1950s. The Bungalow House is one-story in height, has a rectangular shape with a long and low form, and has an irregular floor plan. During the survey, the Bungalow House type was most often represented by an unadorned house of either frame or concrete block construction with a front gable roof, a partial front gable roof porch, and overhanging eaves with exposed rafter ends (Figure 32). Engaged porches that span the entire front elevation were also common amongst the Bungalows recorded. Few of the Bungalows could be considered in the Craftsman style, which is the style most closely associated with the Bungalow type. Some of the houses recorded during the survey possess one or two elements of the style, such as triangular knee braces or battered porch columns. More commonly, those identified during the survey had been altered, either through additions on the rear and/or side elevations, or through the replacement of materials, typically windows, porch posts, or exterior siding.

Minimal Traditional

The Minimal Traditional, or American Small House, type is a small, one-story house that has little to no architectural detail. The type was initially promoted by the Federal Housing Authority (FHA) in the early 1930s. It proliferated during the Great Depression since the houses could be built with FHA-insured loans. The Minimal Traditional house type was used for war and defense homes during World War II, as its simple aesthetic was quick and cost-effective to construct. These qualities also made the house type popular after World War II, as developers were able to quickly secure loans to build Minimal Traditional houses for soldiers returning home from the war. By the 1950s, the Minimal Traditional house type began to lose favor, as the Ranch House gained in popularity. The Minimal Traditional houses identified during the survey tend to be small frame or concrete block buildings with lateral gable or cross gable roofs (Figure 33). Paired double hung sash windows, small gable roof entry porches, and screened side porches were common elements on the surveyed Minimal Traditional houses. Like the Bungalows, most of the Minimal Traditional houses recorded had been altered and had additions and/or replacement materials.

Ranch House

The Ranch House type was the most common house type documented during the survey, most likely due to its widespread popularity during the 1950s and 1960s. The Ranch House is ubiquitous; it can be found in subdivisions, on large agricultural properties, or along corridors fronting national, state, or local highways in both rural and suburban settings. The form and design of the modern Ranch House is loosely derived from nineteenth century Spanish ranches in southern California, primarily borrowing the low, one-story shape, low-pitched roof, and private courtyard. Additional character-defining features include an unobscured front entrance, projecting overhanging eaves, and a variety of exterior finishes and windows. The Ranch Houses identified in the survey area tend to be fairly basic; they express the type but do not have many, if any, stylistic elements. The plain style of these houses is indicative of the social and economic status of those purchasing the homes, either as an affordable house in a subdivision, as a pre-fabricated house kit to be assembled, or one constructed by its owner and modeled after the popular house type (Figure 34). The majority of Ranch Houses documented were the Linear subtype, which is a long and rectangular plan (Figure 35A). The Compact subtype (Figure 35B), which is small and simple, and the Linear with Clusters (Figure 35C), which has a truncated L-shape, were also represented. The houses were constructed from concrete block or were of frame construction with red brick veneer exterior and were predominantly topped by a lateral gable roof with siding in the gable ends. Common features include a tripartite window or multi-pane picture window on the front elevation, double hung sash windows throughout, and decorative porch supports, either wrought iron, wood, or aluminum. While several examples had attached carports or garages, these were usually enclosed to provide more interior space.

The majority of neighborhoods and subdivisions recorded during the survey were Ranch House developments. Most of the subdivisions have only one entrance point and a curvilinear layout with parallel streets bisecting the circular route around the development (Figure 36). Other Ranch House developments recorded during the survey are smaller and located along a secondary thoroughfare or connected to a larger, recently constructed residential development (Figure 37). The houses within the Ranch House developments are typically either the Compact or Linear subtypes located on smaller lots. The houses did not have many stylistic elements and the lots have minimal landscaping. There was some variation in the siting of the houses, as in the Woodside Manor and Springfield Farms subdivisions, it was noted that the houses on corner lots were positioned parallel to the corner instead of parallel to one of the streets (Figure 38).

Modern Houses

Despite initial expectations, few high style mid-twentieth-century buildings were identified during the survey. The first example is of the Shed style, as defined by Virginia Savage McAlester in her updated A Field Guide to American Houses that was popular in the 1970s and 1980s. The style features shed roof forms, typically multi-directional and occasionally paired with a gable roof. The asymmetrical house type has wood cladding oriented vertically, diagonally, or horizontally and is often applied in multiple directions. McAlester also noted that this style was often constructed as a vacation or second home, typically set amongst the trees and fronting a lake or other body of water. The four houses recorded during the survey appeared to be second homes and were located on wooded lots fronting a river or creek. For example, Resource Number U/19/6986 is located along Russell Creek and has an irregular roofline, with the right end taller than left, that is pierced by clearstory windows (Figure 39a). The house has horizontal wooden siding and six-over-six and eight-over-eight double hung sash windows. Wooden steps lead to a large wooden deck and the entrance, which is within the roof's overhanging eaves.

The second example of a high style mid-twentieth-century residence is the Constantine House, located on Lakeshore Drive in Riverland Terrace, the oldest subdivision on James Island. The Constantine House was designed, and originally owned, by Elliott Constantine, son of local Charleston architect Augustus Constantine who practiced in Charleston from the early 1940s until his death in 1976. Elliott studied architecture at Clemson University, graduating with a bachelors' degree in 1965 and joining his father's firm as a partner in 1969; Elliott Constantine still practices architecture in Charleston. The house, constructed in 1974, is an excellent residential example of the International style, with a focus on functionality and open floor plans (Figure 39b). The house has a low and long rectangular plan with a very low-pitched gable roof, white vertical siding, and appears to be raised on a low podium. The front elevation features three sets of full-height sliding glass doors flanked by full-height fixed sash windows, which overlook Saint James Lake across the street from the house. The recessed portion of the front elevation creates a small front porch and contains the front door with sidelight, as well as one of the sets of sliding glass doors.

Riverland Terrace

Riverland Terrace, touted as Charleston's first subdivision, is located on the north end of James Island along the Stono River and Wappoo Creek (Figure 40). It is a large residential development consisting of approximately 800 homes and featuring several different house types and styles, reflecting its extended development, as well as a commercial strip and religious and recreational facilities. Riverland Terrace is situated on what was Wappoo Hall Plantation. The Ficken Family, the final owners of the plantation, slowly subdivided and sold Wappoo Hall to various public and private entities, through the late nineteenth and into the early twentieth century (Williston 2009). In 1917, the Security Savings Bank sold 1,000 acres of Wappoo Hall Plantation to Thomas C. Welch, who then sold the land to his brother, Aubrey, a year later.

Aubrey Welch subdivided the 1,000-acre parcel and sold a 75-acre tract to the Edisto Realty Company, owned by C. Bissell Jenkins, in 1925 (Williston 2009). Jenkins, a local real estate tycoon, purchased the tract in order to develop a model suburb of Charleston he named Riverland Terrace, after the Jenkins family's homestead.

Jenkins's vision of Riverland Terrace was to create an all inclusive, healthy commuter community that was fully engaging while, at the same time, met the daily needs of residents. Marketed as "Suburban Life with City Conveniences," the promotional literature describes the landscape and Jenkins's vision thusly:

"Riverland Terrace, the first important residential suburb of Charleston, is planned and being built upon modern lines. The streets, boulevards, avenues, and drives are planned by an engineer of experience. Immediately upon passing within the artistic gates of the development one will pass through a picturesque little business section where a few shops, a theatre, filling stations, an Inn, markets and other small establishments essential to a model suburb, will eventually be erected. Wappoo Drive, a wide boulevard, continues straight through an avenue of beautiful oaks to the very banks of Stono River. A picturesque water tower is located in the midst of the development on Pemberton Place, named for the famous old fort nearby. Near Pemberton Place will be found an irregular recreational park where are excellent tennis courts. An attractive little lake, Lake St. James, is a feature of the development, and affords many fine water front lots. The lake itself will serve to greatly beautify the development. Other features contemplated for the future are a handsome hotel, overlooking the Stono River, a community house and yacht club. A church, a school, boat landings, a library, playgrounds and many other modern essentials (Jenkins 1925)."

Jenkins intended Riverland Terrace to become the home of Charleston's elite and saw himself as the leader of the community he planned to create. However, the Great Depression and World War II initially hindered the subdivision's growth and altered Jenkins's vision.

Construction of homes in the first phase of Riverland Terrace began in 1926. These initial houses were fairly luxurious for the time and their plans were all approved by an architect or engineer appointed by Edisto Realty Company to ensure each house would meet the standards of the design and beautification of the Riverland Terrace development. The houses constructed prior to the 1930s are sited on larger lots and are of brick or wood frame construction and reflect popular types and styles of the time, such as the Craftsman Bungalow and Tudor Revival (Figure 41). Organic street patterns, scenic views of the river, and small parks were defining landscape features.

After the Great Depression, the sales and development plans changed. Lot sizes decreased and the homes constructed were smaller and modest, usually the Minimal Traditional house type, in order to be affordable to homebuyers in the post-Depression era (Williston 2009). This phase of development, located south of Wappoo Drive, has a more grid-like street pattern and lacks planned public spaces or parks. Development continued from the mid-twentieth century and into the late twentieth century as the construction of Ranch Houses and small duplexes filled empty lots (Figure 42).

Despite economic setbacks brought by the Great Depression, Riverside Terrace did develop many of the amenities C. Bissell Jenkins outlined in his early advertising. A small commercial strip developed by the mid-1940s and included a small grocery, a gas station, barbershop, and a drug store (Figure 43). The neighborhood has public parks, a public boat landing, a church, and a fire station. The neighborhood had its own elementary school until 1970, when it was forced to close due to structural problems. The lot remained vacant and unused until recently, when the Riverland Terrace community was finally able to turn the land into a public park and greenspace. The neighborhood also borders the Charleston Municipal Golf Course, which was established in 1929.

While streets throughout Riverland Terrace feature large oak trees, the allee of oaks along Wappoo Drive is most visible and notable (Figure 44). It is lined with over 70 live oak trees that are well over 100 years old and is said to be the drive that led to Wappoo Hall Plantation. Another unique feature located within Riverland Terrace is Fort Pemberton, a Confederate Civil War earthen fort completed in 1863. The fort was one of the largest constructed by Confederate forces for the defense of Charleston. The house that was constructed on top of Fort Pemberton in 1942 remains there today. In 1978, the fort was listed on the NRHP.

Riverland Terrace began the suburbanization of James Island, establishing it as Charleston's bedroom community. The diversity of homes, retention of the natural landscape, and overall feeling of community differentiates Riverland Terrace from the subsequent suburban development following World War II.

COMMERCIAL BUILDINGS

The commercial buildings recorded during the survey were all one-story, stand-alone buildings. In the rural areas, this takes the form of a community store, while in more developed parts of the county, the commercial buildings lined major thoroughfares. Although the commercial strip in Riverland Terrace now sits amidst dense suburban development, it originally served as a community store, providing goods and services to residents in, what was at the time, a relatively rural area. The recorded commercial buildings held barbershops and grocery stores, auto shops and hardware stores. Of the 49 commercial buildings identified, over half (27) are vacant.

Community Store

The community stores were primarily found in rural areas, particularly in the African American communities. These stores are typically of concrete block construction with a symmetrical façade, front gable roof, and stepped parapet (Figure 45a). Many of the buildings have brick details, such as brick window sills, or brick facades. A shed roof addition along the side elevation is also common. Additionally, several of the stores were associated with a residence, a common occurrence amongst rural community stores.

Other Commercial

The commercial buildings located along major roads do not have a uniform form or design present like the community stores. These ranged from a concrete block building with a lateral gable roof and two small store fronts to a concrete block commercial strip with multiple storefronts to a metal frame building with metal sheathing and large glass display windows dominating the front elevation (Figure 45b).

RELIGIOUS BUILDINGS AND CEMETERIES

The religious properties surveyed ranged from simple concrete block buildings to large, two-story brick veneer churches. The front gable, central tower, and double tower were all identified during the survey, with the front gable type as the most common. Many of the churches had associated cemeteries. In many instances, however, the cemetery pre-dated the church and was already documented. This occurrence was typically found amongst the African Methodist Episcopal (AME) churches, whose church buildings were constructed in the 1960s and 1970s; decades after the congregations were organized. Most of the cemeteries recorded were African American cemeteries identified as such due to their association with an African American church or through their defining qualities of east-west grave orientation, the use of tablet headstones and/or ledger stones to mark graves, and the use of grave markers that are not commercially made.

Front Gable

The front gable church type was found throughout Charleston County and represented by both simple examples and those adorned with classical architectural elements, such as round columns supporting the gable roof porch, cornice and dentils, and broken pediment door surrounds (Figure 46A). Most of the front gable type churches had an addition extending perpendicularly from the rear of the building, giving it an L shape.

Central Tower

The key feature of the central tower type is the projecting central tower that is topped by a pyramidal roof or spire (Figure 46B). The central tower church types recorded during the survey are concrete block or brick veneer and have gable roofs, double hung sash windows running the length of the side elevations, and double doors positioned within the central tower, leading into the church building. Good examples of the central tower church type are the Wesley United Methodist Church in the vicinity of Ladsen and the Greater Howard Chapel AME Church in the Buck Hall community.

Double Tower

The only double tower church type identified during the survey is the New First Missionary Baptist Church on Highway 174 on Edisto Island (Figure 46C). Constructed in 1974, the church is of concrete block construction with concrete block towers with pyramidal roofs at corners of front elevation, flanking the front entrance. The front entrance is within a projecting gable and consists of double doors with a surround consisting of pilasters & cornice. A smaller front gable porch spans the width of the double front doors. Stained glass windows and faux buttresses run along both side elevations.

ENTERTAINMENT/RECREATION PROPERTIES

The entertainment or recreation properties recorded are dance and/or music halls and bars. Mosquito Beach, in the Sol Legare community, is a small collection of buildings that form a popular African American recreation area with a long history in the community. Situated on a small island to south of the island of Sol Legare, Mosquito Beach was originally the site of an oyster factory. Although the business closed its doors at the onset of the Great Depression, residents and former employees used the area for recreation. In 1940, Joe Chavis of Sol Legare constructed a two-story building, operating a small store on the ground floor that sold seafood and sundries. A fire destroyed the building, but Chavis quickly replaced it with a one-story building. With few places along the waterfront to relax and socialize, the area, known as the Factory, became popular with local African American residents and visitors. The name soon changed to Mosquito Beach, due to their prevalence on the small, marsh island. The popularity of Mosquito Beach spurred small businesses to open that provided food, drinks, and entertainment. In 1953, Andrew “Apple” Jackson Wilder constructed the Harborview Pavilion, which was soon followed by a lounge, a restaurant, a motel, and a bumper car ride. Hurricane Grace hit the beach hard in 1959 and all the buildings were either destroyed or damaged. Wilder rebuilt the pavilion within a few months, drawing visitors back to the beach, as well as new businesses.

Mosquito Beach thrived until desegregation opened up ocean beaches to African Americans. No longer a destination for travelers, the beach remained a place for locals to meet. Once again a hurricane – this time Hugo – destroyed and damaged the buildings on Mosquito Beach, including the Harborview Pavilion, which has not been rebuilt. And once again, the Sol Legare community repaired and rebuilt Mosquito Beach. Today, Mosquito Beach retains its restaurants and lounges and continues to provide a place for locals to meeting and socialize, as well as draw weekend crowds from across the Lowcountry.

Mosquito Beach has six buildings, each dating to the early to mid-1970s. The buildings are on the north side of Mosquito Beach Road, facing the water. All the buildings are one story in height, of frame or concrete block construction, and topped by a gable roof (Figures 47 and 48). The exception is the Pine Tree Tavern building, a two-story frame former motel that is now vacant. The buildings along Mosquito Beach vary in size, with the smallest approximately 877 square feet and the largest almost 2,700 square feet. All the buildings have an outdoor area that is either formal, such as a large deck or concrete patio, or an informal arrangement of chairs adjacent to the building. Coupled with walk-up windows on the smaller establishments, the focus of Mosquito Beach is not to be inside the buildings, but to be outdoors socializing and meeting with friends and family; to see and be seen. The arrangement of its built environment reflects its use. Mosquito Beach is an important aspect of the Sol Legare community, as well as the Lowcountry's African American community, providing a place for African Americans to socialize and recreate for decades.

AGRICULTURAL BUILDINGS

There was only one agricultural property identified during the survey and it is a good example of an early to mid-twentieth century farmstead. Located on Koester Road southeast of Ladson, the property has seven buildings: the main house and six outbuildings (Figures 49 and 50). The main house is a Bungalow, circa 1935, with a front gable roof, asbestos shingles and a brick pier foundation. The house has a full front porch, six-over-six double hung sash windows, and a small addition on the rear elevation. The outbuildings consist of a barn, three metal sheds, a small well house, and a two-car carport. The property retains its agricultural fields, which appear to still be in use.

CIVIC/SOCIAL BUILDINGS

Buildings identified during the survey that have a civic or social use included community centers and Masonic lodges. Located within or near the communities these facilities serve or once served, the community centers and lodges each have a similar form and design (Figure 51). Both community centers recorded during the survey are one-story in height, have a rectangular plan, and are of concrete block construction with a lateral gable roof. The lodges are all two stories in height, have a rectangular plan, and are of concrete block construction. The lodges in the South Santee and Buck Hall communities are located in the center of the community, adjacent to the local church. These lodges were important organizations in black communities and provided meeting places for social and community events.

EDUCATIONAL BUILDINGS

Four educational buildings were documented during the survey. A fifth, Mount Zion Elementary School on River Road on Johns Island, was also identified, but an appointment to document the school building was not confirmed. None of the school buildings are still used as schools; two are vacant, one is used as a senior center and medical facility, and one is used as a community center. The two vacant schools served the communities of Snowden and Red Top, respectively. Snowden's former schoolhouse was constructed circa 1920 and is of frame construction with a front gable roof with overhanging eaves and a central front entrance. Windows run down both side elevations and are currently boarded up. The school was used until the Charleston County school system integrated the local schools (Figure 52a).

The vacant school in the Red Top community, the former Tobin Boyd Elementary School, was in use until 1953 when the branch schools serving the black children living in rural Saint Andrews Parish were consolidated. The county's school equalization program provided monies to construct the Wallace School, which housed first through twelfth grades. Currently owned by a private individual, it is not clear what use the former elementary school had until it was sold by the school district in 2004. The building is an one-story, L-shaped school building of brick construction with a flat roof and vertical, five-light awning windows. It is in a state of disrepair due to its continued disuse.

The remaining two former school buildings have found new purposes within their communities. The Larimer Center on Edisto Island was home to a Head Start program and was named after Larimer High School, a high school that served the island's African American community. The building was used as a daycare facility and is now senior citizens center and medical facility. The former elementary school in the Sol Legare community has also found a new use as a community center. Both former schools are one-story, symmetrical concrete block buildings (Figure 52b).

GOVERNMENT/PUBLIC BUILDINGS

The only government building documented during the survey was the Adams Run post office. Constructed circa 1965, the one-story concrete block building has a symmetrical façade an end-to-front gable roof with overhanging eaves and a stepped parapet, three-over-one double hung sash windows, and an exterior brick chimney (Figure 52c). A post office has served Adams Run since 1843.

VI. RECOMMENDATIONS

NRHP RECOMMENDATIONS

New South Associates surveyed 1,319 resources during the Charleston County Survey update. Of those properties, only one individual property, one district, and a corridor of African American communities were identified that appear to meet the eligibility criteria for listing in the NRHP. The Elliot Constantine House (Resource Number U/19/7640) appears to be eligible under Criterion C for significance in the area of architecture (Figure 53a). The Constantine House is a distinctive example of the International style. The style is not common in Charleston, especially in residential design. The house retains a high level of integrity and is an unique fixture within the Riverland Terrace neighborhood. The State Historic Preservation Office (SHPO) concurs with this recommendation (Appendix D).

A second property, the Tobin-Boyd School (Resource Number U/19/6687) located within the Red Top Community, was recognized by the SHPO as individually eligible for the NRHP under Criterion A, as a late example of a segregated African American school (Figure 53b).

The Riverland Terrace neighborhood appears to be eligible as a district under Criterion A for community planning and development and under Criterion C for architecture. Riverland Terrace was the first subdivision on James Island and was initially planned to create an all inclusive, healthy commuter community that was fully engaging while, at the same time, met the daily needs of residents. The Great Depression and World War II initially hindered the subdivision's growth and altered the subdivision's original plan. Lot sizes decreased and the homes constructed were smaller and modest in order to be affordable to homebuyers in the post-Depression era. The changes in the development's plan are still visible, with house types and styles that span the 1920s through the 1970s sited on various lot sizes. Amenities and services originally envision by Riverland Terrace's developer, C. Bissell Jenkins, such as a retail shops, a boat ramp, and parks, are still present. These elements make Riverland Terrace unique from other early and mid-twentieth century suburban residential development in Charleston County. The SHPO did not concur with the recommended eligibility of the Riverland Terrace neighborhood, citing a need for further examination of the buildings and structures that comprise the neighborhood to determine if it retains a high level of integrity.

Charleston County's historic African American communities are a unique cultural resource, one that represents the Gullah people, their culture, and the communities they established during the Reconstruction era. These commonalities link the self-reliant communities, which are located throughout the county. The communities are distributed throughout the county, from South

Santee and Germantown in the northeast, a cluster of settlements near Mt. Pleasant, including Phillips, Snowdon, Ten Mile, and Scanlonville, to Sol Legare and Grimball Farm on James Island in the southwest. They are the most common group resource in unincorporated Charleston County, accounting for approximately 10 percent of the total area surveyed. The presence of so many historic Gullah communities in unincorporated Charleston County reinforces their significance.

The significance of these communities lies within their social organization and settlement patterns, in addition to the stories they have to tell. SCDAH has reviewed preliminary information forms for Mosquito Beach in the Sol Legare community and the Phillips community, finding they may meet NRHP eligibility under Criterion A for community planning and development and black ethnic heritage. Furthermore, Mosquito Beach may possess significance under Criterion A in the area of entertainment/recreation as a historic recreation area developed by African Americans from circa 1935 to circa 1970 (Chandler 2010; Sauls 2016) (See SCDAH correspondence in Appendix D).

The contextual research and survey findings of this report align with their preliminary statements of eligibility for the Phillips community and Mosquito Beach and, due to the countywide extent of this survey, proposes these eligibility recommendations be expanded to include more communities. The historic African American communities of unincorporated Charleston County appear to be eligible under Criterion A in the area of community planning and development for retaining various settlement patterns that were established in the decades following Emancipation. Many of these communities have developed in similar, yet distinctive ways. Some communities are the outgrowth of older slave villages or freedmen settlements established shortly after the Civil War. A few were wholly planned communities designed, financed, and managed by African American cooperative land corporations, while others had their origins in the state-led land reform initiatives operated by the South Carolina Land Commission between 1869 and 1890. While the built environment has changed over time, the historic patterns of African American landownership are still visible through comparison of historic and current mapping and in the arrangement and use of land in the communities today.

The county's historic African American communities, strongly rooted in their Lowcountry Gullah traditions, appear to be eligible for the NRHP under Criterion A for black ethnic heritage. With social values founded on landownership, extended family ties, and religion, Gullah communities are known for their self-sufficiency and self-reliance. The communities maintained a localized economy through the 1970s, growing food for themselves and community members and fishing and shrimping in nearby creeks or rivers. Although few practice agriculture today, connections to the land remain strong, in some instances, extending back to the period of slavery, and land ownership among families has been maintained over the generations through conveyance as heirs' property. This shared Gullah culture is also manifested in language, foodways, use of local natural materials, and traditional crafts. Over the course of the twentieth century, the sweetgrass basket has become one of the most visible and well-known symbols of Lowcountry Gullah culture. Charleston County emerged as the epicenter of the sweetgrass basket making industry as basket makers lined U.S. 17 with stalls to sell their wares to passing automobile tourists.

Several historic African American communities have sought out formal recognition of the importance of their history in Charleston County. Previous SCDAH correspondence has recommended the preparation of a Multiple Property Submission (MPS) to the NRHP that addresses the significance of these communities under Criterion A for their association with freedmen's settlements and Lowcountry Gullah culture. The MPS, which nominates groups of associated significant properties, would establish the framework under which to nominate properties, streamline the process, and provide an important tool for preservation planning in these communities moving forward.

At present, there appears to be sufficient survey data and documentation for the NRHP nomination of the following four communities as historic districts: Phillips, Sol Legare (including the Mosquito Beach recreation area), Scanlonville, and Snowden. Preliminary NRHP boundaries for these proposed districts are provided in Figures 54-57.

Other historic African American communities within unincorporated Charleston County may also be eligible for nomination under the MPS (Table 4). At present, a few existing studies have been made, which may help facilitate additional nominations. In 2005, the NPS released the Lowcountry Gullah Culture: Special Resource Study and Environmental Impact Statement, which provided a broad contextual history of Gullah-Geechee culture along the Southeastern coastal zone between North Carolina and North Florida. New South Associates conducted a survey and study of the Gullah sweetgrass basket stalls along U.S. 17 in Charleston County as part of a highway-widening project in 2009. Clemson University and the College of Charleston, under the direction of Cari Goetcheus, recorded and transcribed 25 oral histories as part of a study entitled "East Cooper Historic African American Communities of Charleston County" in 2007-2009. Goetcheus' work would provide an excellent foundation upon which to build an expanded oral history collection for other relevant communities in the county. The Avery Research Center Oral History Collection, which documents African American experiences in the Lowcountry, should be consulted and considered for a possible partnership prior to undertaking the project. Finally, more research is needed in order to better establish settlement types, community boundaries, and history of development. Further research of the Land Commission records, as well as deed and plat research would most likely uncover a wealth of information about the establishment of these communities.

The SHPO concurs with the recommendation that Phillips, Snowden, Sol Legare, and Scanlonville are eligible for the NRHP and the preparation of an MPS to the NRHP that addresses the significance of these communities under Criterion A for their association with freedmen’s settlements and Lowcountry Gullah culture.

THREATS TO HISTORIC RESOURCES IN CHARLESTON COUNTY

Charleston County has experienced unprecedented growth over the past few decades. From just 2000 to 2010, the county’s population increased by 13 percent, from 309,969 residents to 350,209 (U.S. Census Bureau 2016). As more people move to Charleston County, the need for new development threatens existing cultural resources. The last countywide survey was conducted in 1992 and had significant data gaps. This survey update enables Charleston County staff to better identify historic properties and work with property owners and residents to preserve local history. The information gathered will provide much-needed groundwork to strengthen the local historic preservation ordinance and ensure the preservation and promotion of Charleston County's history.

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR FUTURE PRESERVATION PLANNING EFFORTS

Charleston County has an abundance of cultural resources that should be recognized and preserved to ensure the county's significant historic buildings and structures are not lost to future growth and development. The county has committed to preservation planning and should continue to foster these efforts. It is recommended that Charleston County consider the following to expand its historic preservation efforts:

1. Continue to develop an inventory of historic resources in Charleston County.
 - Conduct a survey to complete the inventory of the county's mid-twentieth century cultural resources within unincorporated Charleston County, including, but not limited to, the Mount Zion School on Johns Island; the Carver subdivision, the first African American subdivision on James Island; and the unincorporated areas of Charleston County that were not visited during this survey, namely James Island and Wadmalaw Island.
 - Coordinate with local municipalities to pursue funding opportunities to update inventories of incorporated neighborhoods, such as Ashleyville, Maryville, West Ashley, James Island, and Mount Pleasant. These areas feature suburban development dating to the mid-twentieth century and may not have been included in previous surveys;
 - Share survey information with property owners and community representatives for properties identified as eligible for the NRHP; and Collaborate with local communities and organizations to pursue funding to complete the MPS and individual nominations for the county's historic African American communities. The underrepresented communities grant through the NPS would support the survey, inventory, and designation of historic properties that are associated with communities currently underrepresented in the NRHP and NHL. Such funding could support efforts to document the African American communities that were not recorded during this survey and to list them under the MPS.

2. Consider amendments to the Charleston County Zoning and Land development Regulations Ordinance (ZLDR) to implement historic preservation planning efforts outlined in the Cultural Resources Element of the Charleston County Comprehensive Plan and goals of the Historic Preservation Committee of the Planning Commission.

- Seek ways to amend zoning and land development regulations to preserve and enhance the settlement patterns of the historic African American communities identified in this report;
 - Establish a process for maintaining a local historic resources inventory for properties (including cemeteries) in unincorporated Charleston County that includes NRHP-eligible and not eligible resources;
 - Coordinate with municipalities in Charleston County and SCDAH to create a database of historic resources throughout the county;
 - Consider expanding historic preservation regulations in the ZLDR to apply to properties eligible for listing on the NRHP, as well as those included in a local historic resources inventory, should one be created; and
 - Apply to become a Certified Local Government (CLG) to establish a partnership with SCDAH and NPS.
3. Promote public education and understanding of historic resources located in the unincorporated areas of Charleston County.
- Provide information to Charleston County citizens on local, state, and federal historic preservation tax incentives;
 - Promote community-driven preservation by providing resources for historic preservation grants and opportunities to local communities;
 - Coordinate with SCDAH to erect historical markers in unincorporated communities to commemorate local history;
 - Work with local social studies and history teachers to supplement classroom lessons and readings with information about Charleston County's historic places, as well as creating programs that discuss the importance of historic preservation while highlighting the county's significant properties; and

- Coordinate with the Charleston County Public Library, local historical societies, and preservation organizations to share findings from this survey update and future preservation planning projects.
4. Promote historic preservation as a means to encourage economic development.
 - Encourage adaptive reuse and rehabilitation of historic properties and
 - Promote heritage tourism in communities that seek unique economic development opportunities, such as the Grimball Farm and Sol Legare communities on James Island and the Parkers Ferry and Wiltown communities in western Charleston County.
 5. Invest in training county staff members and appointed and elected officials on the value of historic preservation planning.
 - Encourage attendance at historic preservation educational events hosted locally in the Charleston area and by SCDAH to learn best practices in the field of preservation planning and
 - Participate in e-learning preservation planning opportunities provided by the American Planning Association, National Trust for Historic Preservation, and similar organizations.

APPENDIX D: SCDAH CORRESPONDENCE

April 12, 2010

Mr. Richard Habersham
2938 Bennett Charles Road
Mt. Pleasant, SC 29466

Re: Phillips Community, Mt. Pleasant vicinity [Charleston County]

Dear Mr. Habersham:

Thank you so much for taking the time on January 14, 2010 to show Rebekah Dobrasko, David Kelly, and Chuck Cantley around the Phillips Community. I had planned to visit there that day as well, but was detained unexpectedly here in Columbia with personal business. I regret not being able to join you all that day. Thank you for sending us copies of the historic maps that you and the community have collected as well. I also apologize for the length of time that has passed between the site visit and this letter, and regret any inconvenience that has caused you and others there in the community.

The Phillips Community, as we have learned, is a post-bellum freedman's community near Mount Pleasant. The community was carved from the Laurel Hill plantation after the Civil War, and parcels within the community were sold to newly-freed slaves for $63 to $100. Phillips, along with several other freedman's communities in the Mt. Pleasant area, became the epicenters for sweetgrass basket making and other cultural activities related to the Gullah community along the coast of South Carolina.

Today, about 85% of the residents in the Phillips Community are descended from the original owners of land within the community. Although the land has been subdivided somewhat among descendants, the original plat lines can still be seen within the current plats. This tradition of division of the land is reflected today in the "family compounds" throughout the community.

The significance of Phillips as a continuing Gullah community is made stronger when considered along with other traditionally rural Gullah communities in the Mt. Pleasant area, including Scanlonville, Snowden, Green Hill, and Hamlin. While each community has its unique characteristics related to its particular founding and development, the presence of multiple Gullah communities in the area makes the historic significance of each community that much greater.

Although hardly any "historic" buildings remain today in the Phillips Community, it is the opinion of our office that Phillips meets the criteria for listing in the National Register of Historic Places as a cultural landscape and as a Traditional Cultural Property (TCP). As the staff members mentioned to you on the site visit, TCPs are a special designation of properties in the National Register that reflect the cultural values and heritage of a certain property. Since the Phillips Community is linked to the Gullah community and its traditions (agricultural, sweetgrass basket making through generations, fishing, etc.), we believe that Phillips and most likely other communities in the Mount Pleasant area are excellent examples of TCPs. They seem, in our view, to meet Criterion A for the National Register, under Community Planning and Development and Black [African American] Ethnic Heritage.

Our office recommends the preparation of a Multiple Property Submission [MPS] to the National Register of Historic Places, inclusive of a historic context that discusses the development of all of the historically rural African American communities in the Mt. Pleasant area. This context should pull from the history and research developed as part of the Low Country Gullah Culture: Special Resource Study and Environmental Impact Statement (2005) prepared by the National Park Service; the research, survey, maps, and oral histories developed by Dr. Cari Goetchus with Clemson University; and the history and context within the cultural resources survey conducted on behalf of the South Carolina Department of Transportation for the widening of US Highway 17 in Mount Pleasant. Other resources for the Multiple Property Submission [MPS] could include those collected by the Gullah-Geechee Cultural Heritage Corridor, the Sweetgrass Basket Makers Association, and other local historical societies. The overall MPS cover document, completed on a multiple property documentation form, should discuss the significance of the Gullah communities in and around Mount Pleasant, while the Phillips Community National Register nomination, prepared on an individual registration form, should discuss in detail the history, development, and resources specific to the Phillips Community.

The Phillips Community, once formally nominated or processed through the South Carolina State Board of Review for the National Register and approved by the National Park Service in Washington, would be listed as an individual historic district/landscape under the overarching Multiple Property Submission [MPS] document. This approach will help readers of these documents who know little or nothing about the traditional communities of the Mt. Pleasant area understand the history of the Phillips Community within a larger context of historical development.

Please let us know if you would like to pursue this approach to having the Phillips Community documented and listed in the National Register. If you do, we will be happy to work with you to determine how best to accomplish that goal. If you have questions about the process, please do not hesitate to contact me at 803-896-6179.

Thank you for your interest in preserving a vital part of South Carolina's coastal African American history. We look forward to hearing from you and working with you on this important documentation project.

Sincerely,

Andrew W. Chandler

Re: Mosquito Beach, Sol Legare Island [Charleston County]

Dear Mr. Wilder:

Thank you for submitting a Preliminary Information Form with background information regarding Mosquito Beach on Sol Legare Island in Charleston County. Mosquito Beach, as we have learned, is a historic recreation area developed by African Americans (roughly during the period circa 1935-circa 1970) who were excluded from other recreation areas in Charleston County during the era of racial segregation. Based on the information you have provided, it is the opinion of our office that Mosquito Beach meets the criteria for listing in the National Register of Historic Places. Since Mosquito Beach is associated with the African American community and their response to the limited options for entertainment imposed by racial segregation it appears, in our view, to meet Criterion A for the National Register, in the areas of "Entertainment/Recreation" and/or "Ethnic Heritage: Black."

The area that is eligible for the National Register includes those parcels for which you submitted information (Charleston County tax map numbers 330-10-00-025, 330-10-00-026, 330-00-00-027, and 330-00-00-028). Additional research and documentation may justify a larger area that includes additional parcels. Before a National Register nomination is prepared, I would recommend further research and documentation to 1) identify additional parcels, if any, that are also historically associated with Mosquito Beach, and 2) document the physical integrity of any additional buildings that may be identified. For a National Register nomination to be successful for Mosquito Beach, it is very important that a historical context for the area be fully developed. I have also encouraged the consultants who are currently conducting an updated historic properties survey for Charleston County to record properties in the Mosquito Beach area so that they can be identified and evaluated for National Register eligibility. A National Register nomination for Mosquito Beach should draw from relevant data in the county survey project when it is completed later this year.

Thank you for your interest in preserving a vital part of South Carolina's coastal African American history. We look forward to hearing from you and working with you on this important documentation project. Please find enclosed instructions, forms, and a sample nomination for your reference. Please contact me if you have any questions (803-896-6172; bsauls@scdah.sc.gov).

Sincerely,

CHARLESTON COUNTY HISTORIC RESOURCES SURVEY UPDATE
NATIONAL REGISTER EVALUATIONS (August 2016)

The following determinations are based on evaluations of the Charleston County Historic Resources Survey Update by the State Historic Preservation Office (SHPO) of the S.C. Department of Archives and History. It is the opinion of the SHPO that the properties meet the eligibility criteria for inclusion in the National Register of Historic Places. These determinations are based on the present architectural integrity and available historical information for the properties included in the survey area. Properties may be removed from or added to this list if changes are made that affect a property's physical integrity. Historical information that is brought to the attention of SHPO Staff confirming or denying a property's historic significance may also affect a property's eligibility status. The process of identifying and evaluating historic properties is never complete; therefore, the SHPO encourages readers of this report to provide additional historical information or alert SHPO Staff regarding properties that may have been overlooked during this evaluation.
